PREFACE.

FEW ſubjects have of late years more employed the pens of every claſs of critics, than the improvement of the Engliſh language. The greateſt abilities in the nation have been exerted in cultivating and reforming it; nor have a thouſand minor critics been wanting to add their mite of amendment to their native tongue. Johnſon, whoſe large mind and juſt taſte made him capable of enriching and adorning the language with original compoſition, has condeſcended to the drudgery of diſentangling, explaining, and arranging it, and left a laſting monument of his ability, labour, and patience: and Dr. Lowth, the politeſt ſcholar of the age, has veiled his ſuperiority in his ſhort Introduction to Engliſh Grammar. The ponderous folio has gravely vindicated the rights of analogy; and the light ephemeral ſheet of news has corrected errors in Grammar, as well as in Politics, by ſlyly marking them in italics.

Nor has the improvement ſtopped here. While Johnſon and Lowth have been inſenſibly operating on the orthography and conſtruction of our language, its pronunciation has not been neglected. The importance of a conſiſtent and regular pronunciation was too obvious to be overlooked; and the want of this conſiſtency and regularity induced ſeveral ingenious men to endeavour at a reformation; who, by exhibiting the anomalies of pronunciation, and pointing out its analogies, have reclaimed ſome words that were not irrecoverably fixed in a wrong ſound, and prevented others from being perverted by ignorance or caprice.

Among thoſe writers who deſerve the firſt praiſe on this ſubject, is Mr. Elphinſton; who, in his Principles of the Engliſh Language, has reduced the chaos to a ſyſtem, and, by a deep inveſtigation of the analogies of our tongue, laid the foundation of a juſt and regular pronunciation.

After him, Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement by his Rhetorical Dictionary; in which the words are divided into ſyllables as they are pronounced, and figures placed over the vowels to indicate their different ſounds. But this gentleman has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation—thoſe very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be conſulted.

To him ſucceeded Mr. Sheridan; who not only divided the words into ſyllables, and placed figures over the vowels as Dr. Kenrick had done, but by ſpelling theſe ſyllables as they are pronounced, ſeemed to complete the idea of a Pronouncing Dictionary, and to leave but little expectation of future improvement. It muſt, indeed, be confeſſed, that Mr. Sheridan's Dictionary is greatly ſuperior to every other that preceded it; and his method of conveying the ſound of words, by ſpelling them as they are pronounced, is highly rational and uſeful—But here ſincerity obliges me to ſtop. The numerous inſtances I have given of impropriety, inconſiſtency, and want of acquaintance with the analogies of the language, ſufficiently ſhow how imperfect * I think his Dictionary is upon the whole, and what ample room was left for attempting another that might better anſwer the purpoſe of a guide to pronunciation.

The laſt writer on this ſubject is Mr. Nares; who, in his Elements of Orthöepy, has ſhewn a clearneſs of method and an extent of obſervation which deſerve the higheſt encomiums. His preface alone proves him an elegant writer, as well as a philoſophical obſerver of language; and his alphabetical index, referring near five thouſand words to the rules for pronouncing them, [illegible] new and uſeful method of treating the ſubject; but he ſeems, on many occaſions, to have miſtaken the beſt uſage, and to have paid too little attention to the firſt principles of pronunciation.

Thus I have ventured to give my opinion of my rivals and competitors, and I hope without envy or ſelf-conceit. Perhaps it would have been policy in me to have been ſilent on this head, for fear of putting the publick in mind that others have written on the ſubject as well as myſelf: but this is a narrow policy which, under the colour of tenderneſs to others, is calculated to raiſe ourſelves at their expence. A writer, who is conſcious he deſerves the attention of the public, (and unleſs he is thus conſcious he ought not to write,) muſt not only wiſh to be compared with thoſe who have gone before him, but will promote the compariſon by informing his readers what others have done, and on what he founds his pretenſions to a preference; and if this be done with fairneſs and impartiality, it can be no more offenſive to modeſty, than it is to honeſty and plain dealing.

The work I have to offer on the ſubject has, I hope, added ſomething to the publick ſtock. It not only exhibits the principles of pronunciaion on a more extenſive plan than others have done, divides the words into ſyllables, and marks the ſounds of the vowels like Dr. Kenrick, ſpells the words as they are pronounced like Mr. Sheridan, and directs the inſpector to the rule by the word like Mr. Nares; but where words are ſubject to different pronunciations, it ſhows the reaſons from analogy for each; produces authorities for one ſide and the other, and points out the pronunciation which is preferable. In ſhort, I have endeavoured to unite the ſcience of Mr. Elphinſton, the method of Mr. Nares, and the general utility of Mr. Sheridan; and to add to theſe advantages, have given critical obſervations on ſuch words as are ſubject to a diverſity of pronunciation. How I have ſucceeded, muſt be left to the deciſion of the publick.

But to all works of this kind there lies a formidable objection; which is, that the pronunciation of a language is neceſſarily indefinite and fugitive, and that all endeavours to delineate or ſettle it are in vain. Dr. Johnſon, in his Grammar prefixed to his Dictionary, ſays: "Moſt of the "writers of Engliſh grammar have given long tables of words pronounced otherwiſe than they "are written; and ſeem not ſufficiently to have conſidered, that, of Engliſh, as of all living "tongues, there is a double pronunciation; one, curſory and colloquial; the other, regular and "ſolemn. The curſory pronunciation is always vague and uncertain, being made different, in "different mouths, by negligence, unſkilfulneſs, or affectation. The ſolemn pronunciation, "though by no means immutable and permanent, is yet always leſs remote from the orthography, "and leſs liable to capricious innovation. They have, however, generally formed their tables "according to the curſory ſpeech of thoſe with whom they happened to converſe; and concluding, "that the whole nation combines to vitiate language in one manner, have often eſtabliſhed the "jargon of the loweſt of the people as the model of ſpeech. For pronunciation, the beſt general "rule is, to conſider thoſe as the moſt elegant ſpeakers who deviate leaſt from the written words."

Without any derogation from the character of Dr. Johnſon, it may be aſſerted, that in theſe obſervations we do not perceive that juſtneſs and accuracy of thinking for which he is ſo remarkable. It would be doing great injuſtice to him to ſuppoſe, thas he meant to exclude all poſſibility of conveying the actual pronunciation of many words that depart manifeſtly from their orthography, or of thoſe that are written alike, and pronounced differently, and inverſely. He has marked theſe differences with great propriety himſelf in many places of his Dictionary; and it is to be regretted that he did not extend theſe remarks farther. It is impoſſible, therefore, he could ſuppoſe, that, becauſe the almoſt imperceptible glances of colloquial pronunciation were not to be caught and deſcribed by the pen, that the very perceptible difference between the initial accented ſyllables of money and monitor, or the final unaccented ſyllables of finite and infinite, could not be ſufficiently marked upon paper. Cannot we ſhow that cellar, a vault; and ſeller, one who ſells, have exactly the ſame ſound; or that the monoſyllable full, and the firſt ſyllable of fulminate, are ſounded differently, becauſe there are ſome words in which ſolemnity will authorize a different ſhade of pronunciation from familiarity? Beſides; that colloquial pronunciation which is perfect, is ſo much the language of ſolemn ſpeaking, that, perhaps, there is no more difference than between the ſame picture painted to be viewed near and at a diſtance. The ſymmetry in both is exactly the ſame; and the diſtinction lies only in the colouring. The Engliſh language, in this reſpect, ſeems to have a great ſuperiority over the French; which pronounces many letters in the poetic and ſolemn ſtyle that are wholly ſilent in the proſaic and familiar. But if a ſolemn and familiar pronunciation really exiſts in our language, is it not the buſineſs of a grammarian to mark both? And if he cannot point out the preciſe ſound of unaccented ſyllables, (for theſe only are liable to obſcurity,) he may, at leaſt, give thoſe ſounds which approach the neareſt; and by this means become a little more uſeful than thoſe who ſo liberally leave every thing to the ear and taſte of the ſpeaker.

The truth is, Dr. Johnſon ſeems to have had a confuſed idea of the diſtinctneſs and indiſtinctneſs with which, on ſolemn or familiar occaſions, we ſometimes pronounce the unaccented vowels; and with reſpect to theſe, it muſt be owned, that his remarks are not entirely without foundation. The Engliſh language, with reſpect to its pronunciation, is evidently diviſible into accented and unaccented ſounds. The accented ſyllables, by being pronounced with greater force than the unaccented, have their vowels as clearly and diſtinctly ſounded as any given note in muſic; while the unaccented vowels, for want of the ſtreſs, are apt to ſlide into an obſcurity of ſound, which though ſufficiently diſtinguiſhable to the ear, cannot be ſo definitely marked out to the eye by other ſounds as thoſe vowels that are under the accent. Thus ſome of the vowels, when neither under the accent, nor cloſed by a conſonant, have a longer or a ſhorter, an opener or a cloſer ſound, according to the ſolemnity or familiarity, the deliberation or rapidity of our delivery. This will be perceived in the ſound of the e in emotion *, of the o in obedience, and of the u in ſingular. In the haſty pronunciation of common ſpeaking, the e in emotion is often ſhortened, as if ſpelt im-mo-tion; the o in obedience is ſhortened and obſcured, as if written ub-be-di-ence; and the u in monument changed into e, as if written mon-ne-ment; while the deliberate and elegant ſound of theſe vowels is the long open ſound they have, when the accent is on them in equal, over, and unit; but a, when unaccented, ſeems to have no ſuch diverſity; it has generally a ſhort obſcure ſound, whether ending a ſyllable, or cloſed by a conſonant. Thus the a in able has its definite and diſtinct ſound; but the ſame letter in tolerable † goes into an obſcure indefinite ſound approaching to ſhort u; nor can any ſolemnity or deliberation give it the long open ſound it has in the firſt word. Thus, by diſtinguiſhing vowels into their accented and unaccented ſounds, we are enabled to ſee clearly what Dr. Johnſon ſaw but obſcurely; and by this diſtinction entirely to obviate the objection.

Equally indefinite and uncertain is his general rule, that thoſe are to be conſidered as the moſt elegant ſpeakers who deviate leaſt from the written words. It is certain, where cuſtom is equal, this ought to take place; and if the whole body of reſpectable Engliſh ſpeakers were equally divided in their pronunciation of the word buſy, one half pronouncing it bew-ze ‡, and the other half biz-ze, that the former ought to be accounted the moſt elegant ſpeakers; but till this is the caſe, the latter pronunciation, though a groſs deviation from orthography, will ſtill be eſteemed the moſt elegant. Dr. Johnſon's general rule, therefore, can only take place where cuſtom has not plainly decided; but unfortunately for the Engliſh language, its orthography and pronunciation are ſo widely different, that Dr. Watts and Dr. Jones lay it down as a maxim in their treatiſes on ſpelling, that all words, which can be ſounded different ways, muſt be written according to that ſound which is moſt diſtant from the true pronunciation; and conſequently, in ſuch a language, a Pronouncing Dictionary muſt be of eſſential uſe.

But ſtill it may be objected to ſuch an undertaking, that the fluctation of pronunciation is ſo great as to render all attempts to ſettle it uſeleſs. What will it avail us, it may be ſaid, to know the pronunciation of the preſent day, if, in a few years, it will be altered? And how are we to know even what the preſent pronunciation is, when the ſame words are often differently pronounced by different ſpeakers, and thoſe, perhaps, of equal numbers and reputation? To which it may be anſwered, that the fluctuation of our language, with reſpect to its pronunciation, ſeems to have been greatly exaggerated *. Except a very few ſingle words, which are generally noticed in the following Dictionary, and the words where e comes before r, followed by another conſonant, as merchant, ſervice, &c. the pronunciation of the language is probably in the ſame ſtate it was in a century ago; and had the ſame attention been then paid to it as now, it is not likely even that change would have happened. The ſame may be obſerved of thoſe words which are differently pronounced by different ſpeakers: if the analogies of the language were better underſtood, it is ſcarcely conceivable that ſo many words in polite uſage would have a diverſity of pronunciation, which is at once ſo ridiculous and embarraſſing; nay, perhaps it may be with confidence aſſerted, that if the analogies of the language were ſufficiently known, and ſo near at hand as to be applicable on inſpection to every word, that not only many words which are wavering between contrary uſages would be ſettled in their true ſound, but that many words, which are fixed by cuſtom to an improper pronunciation, would by degrees grow regular and analogical; and thoſe which are ſo already would be ſecured in their purity, by a knowledge of their regularity and analogy.

* The old and new Ἀττικὶς, with all the various dialects, muſt have occaſioned infinite irregularity in the pronunciation of the Greek tongue; and if we may judge of the Latin pronunciation by the ancient inſcriptions, it was little leſs various and irregular than the Greek. Aulus Gellius tells us, that Nigidius, a grammarian who lived a little more than a century before him, acuted the firſt ſyllable of Valeri; but ſays he, "ſi quis nunc Valerium appellans in caſu vocandi ſecundum id preceptum Nigidii acuerit "primam, non aberit quin rideatur." Whoever now ſhould place the accent on the firſt ſyllable of Valerius, when a vocative caſe, would ſet every body a-laughing. Even that highly-poliſhed language the French, if we may believe a writer in the Encyclopédie, is little leſs irregular in this reſpect than our own.

Il eſt arrivé, ſays he, par les altérations qui ſe ſuccedent rapidement dans la manière de prononcer, & les corrections qui s'introduiſent lentement dans la manière d'écrire, que la prononciation & l'écriture ne marchent point enſemble, & que quoiqu'il y ait chez les peuples les plus policés de l'Europe, des ſociétés d'hommes de lettres chargés des les modérer, des les accorder, & de les rapprocher de la même ligne, elles ſe trouvent enfin à une diſtance inconcevable; enſorte que de deux choſes dont l'une n'a été imaginée dans ſon origine, que pour répréſenter fidellement l'autre, celle-ci ne differe guère moins de celle-là, que le portrait de la même perſonne peinte dans deux ages très-éloignés. Enfin l'inconvénient s'eſt accru à un tel excès qu'on n'oſe plus y remédier. On prononce une langue, on écrit une autre: & l'on s'accoutume tellement pendant le reſte de la vie à cette biſarrerie qui a fait verſer tant de larmes dans l'enfance, que ſi l'on renonçoit à ſa mauvaiſe orthographe pour une plus voiſine de la prononciation, on ne reconnoîtroit plus la langue parlée ſous cette nouvelle combinaiſon de caractères. S'il y en a qui ne pourroient ſe ſuccéder ſans une grande fatigue pour l'organe, ou ils ne ſe rencontrent point, ou ils ne durent pas. Ils ſont échappés de la langue par l'euphonie, cette loi puiſſante, qui agit continuellement & univerſellement ſans égard pour l'étymologie & ſes défenſeurs, et qui tend ſans interminſion à amener des êtres qui ont les mêmes organes, le même idiôme, les mêmes mouvemens preſcrits, à-peu-près à la même prononciation. Les cauſes dont l'action n'eſt point interrompue, deviennent toujours les plus fortes avec les tems, quelque foibles qu'elles ſoient en elles-mêmes, & il n'y a preſque pas une ſeule voyelle, une ſeule diphthongue, une ſeule conſonne dont la valeur ſoit tellement conſtante, que l'euphonie n'en puiſſe diſpoſer, ſoit en altérant le ſon, ſoit en le ſupprimant.

I ſhall not decide upon the juſtneſs of theſe complaints, but muſt obſerve, that a worſe picture could ſcarcely be drawn of the Engliſh, or the moſt barbarous language of Europe. Indeed a degree of verſatility ſeems involved in the very nature of language, and is one of thoſe evils left by Providence for man to correct: a love of order, and the utility of regularity, will always incline him to confine this verſatility within as narrow bounds as poſſible.

But the utility of a work of this kind is not confined to thoſe parts of language where the impropriety is groſs and palpable; beſides thoſe imperfections in pronunciation, which diſguſt every ear not accuſtomed to them, there are a thouſand inſenſible deviations, in the more minute parts of language, as the unaccented ſyllables may be called, which do not ſtrike the ear ſo forcibly as to mark any direct impropriety in particular words, but occaſion only ſuch a general imperfection as gives a bad impreſſion upon the whole. Speakers with theſe imperfections paſs very well in common converſation; but when they are required to pronounce with emphaſis, and for that purpoſe to be more diſtinct and definite in their utterance, here their ear fails them; they have been accuſtomed only to looſe curſory ſpeaking, and for want of a firmneſs of pronunciation, are like thoſe painters who draw the muſcular exertions of the human body without any knowledge of anatomy. This is one reaſon, perhaps, why we find the elocution of ſo few people agreeable when they read or ſpeak to an aſſembly, while ſo few offend us by their utterance in common converſation. A thouſand faults lie concealed in a miniature, which a microſcope brings to view; and it is only by pronouncing on a larger ſcale, as public ſpeaking may be called, that we prove the propriety of our elocution. As, therefore, there are certain deviations from analogy which are not at any rate tolerable, there are others which only, as it were, tarniſh the pronunciation, and make it leſs brilliant and agreeable. There are few who have turned their thoughts on this ſubject without obſerving, that they ſometimes pronounce the ſame word or ſyllable in a different manner; and as neither of theſe manners offend the ear, they are at a loſs to which they ſhall give the preference; but as one muſt neceſſarily be more agreeable to the analogy of the language than the other, a diſplay of theſe analogies, in a Dictionary of this kind, will immediately remove this uncertainty; and in this view of the variety we ſhall diſcover a fitneſs in one mode of ſpeaking, which will give a firmneſs and ſecurity to our pronunciation, from a confidence that it is founded on reaſon, and the general tendency of the language. See Principles, No. 530, 547, 551, &c.

But, alas! reaſoning on language, however well founded, may be all overturned by a ſingle quotation from Horace:

" Quem penès arbitrium eſt, & jus & norma loquendi."

This, it muſt be owned, is a ſuccinct way of ending the controverſy; and by virtue of this argument we may become criticks in language without the trouble of ſtudying it. Not that I would be thought, in the moſt diſtant manner, to deny, that Cuſtom is the ſovereign arbiter of language. Far from it. I acknowledge its authority, and know there is no appeal from it. I wiſh only to diſpute where this arbiter has not decided; for if once Cuſtom ſpeak out, however abſurdly, I ſincerely acquieſce in its ſentence.

But what is this cuſtom to which we muſt ſo implicitly ſubmit? Is it the uſage of the multitude of ſpeakers, whether good or bad? This has never been aſſerted by the moſt ſanguine abettors of its authority. Is it the majority of the ſtudious in ſchools and colleges, with thoſe of the learned profeſſions, or of thoſe who, from their elevated birth or ſtation, give laws to the refinements and elegancies of a court? To confine propriety to the latter, which is too often the caſe, ſeems an injury to the former; who, from their very profeſſion, appear to have a natural right to a ſhare, at leaſt, in the legiſlation of language, if not to an abſolute ſovereignty. The poliſhed attendants on a throne are as apt to depart from ſimplicity in language as in dreſs and manners; and novelty, inſtead of cuſtom, is too often the jus & norma loquendi of a court.

Perhaps an attentive obſervation will lead us to conclude, that the uſage, which ought to direct us, is neither of theſe we have been enumerating, taken ſingly, but a ſort of compound ratio of all three. Neither a finical pronunciation of the court, nor a pedantic Græciſm of the ſchools, will be denominated reſpectable uſage, till a certain number of the general maſs of ſpeakers have acknowledged them; nor will a multitude of common ſpeakers authoriſe any pronunciation which is reprobated by the learned and polite.

As thoſe ſounds, therefore, which are the moſt generally received among the learned and polite, as well as the bulk of ſpeakers, are the moſt legitimate, we may conclude that a majority of two of theſe ſtates ought always to concur, in order to conſtitute what is called good uſage.

But though cuſtom, when general, is commonly well underſtood, there are ſeveral ſtates and degrees of it which are exceedingly obſcure and equivocal; and the only method of knowing the extent of cuſtom in theſe caſes, ſeems to be an inſpection of thoſe Dictionaries which profeſſedly treat of pronunciation. We have now ſo many works of this kind, that the general current of cuſtom, with reſpect to the ſound of words, may be collected from them with almoſt as much certainty as the general ſenſe of words from Johnſon. An exhibition of the opinions of orthöepiſts about the ſound of words always appeared to me a very rational method of determining what is called cuſtom. This method I have adopted in the following work; and if I have ſometimes diſſented from the majority, it has been, either from a perſuaſion of being better informed of what was the actual cuſtom of ſpeaking, or from a partiality to the evident analogies of the language.

And here I muſt intreat the candid reader to make every reaſonable allowance for the freedom with which I have critiſed other writers on this ſubject, and particularly Mr. Sheridan. As a man, a gentleman, and a ſcholar, I knew Mr. Sheridan, and reſpected him; and think every lover of elocution owes him a tribute of thanks for his unwearied addreſſes to the publick, to rouſe them to the ſtudy of the delivery of their native tongue. But this tribute, however juſt, does not exempt him from examination. His credit with the world neceſſarily ſubjects him to animadverſion, becauſe the errors of ſuch a writer are dangerous in proportion to his reputation: this has made me zealous to remark his inaccuracies, but not without giving my reaſons; nor have I ever taken advantage of ſuch faults as may be called inadvertencies*. On the ſame principles I have ventured to criticiſe Dr. Johnſon, (ſee Sceptic, Scirrhus, Codle, Further, &c.) whoſe friendſhip and advice I was honoured with, whoſe memory I love, and whoſe intellectual powers impreſs me with ſomething like religious veneration and awe. I do not pretend to be exempt from faults myſelf; in a work like the preſent, it would be a miracle to eſcape them; nor have I the leaſt idea of deciding as a judge, in a caſe of ſo much delicacy and importance, as the pronunciation of a whole people; I have only aſſumed the part of an advocate to plead the cauſe of conſiſtency and analogy, and where cuſtom is either ſilent or dubious, to tempt the lovers of their language to incline to the ſide of propriety; ſo that my deſign is principally to give a kind of hiſtory of pronunciation, and a regiſter of its preſent ſtate; and where the authorities of dictionaries or ſpeakers are found to differ, to give ſuch a diſplay of the analogies of the language as may enable every inſpector to decide for himſelf.

With reſpect to the explanation of words, except in very few inſtances, I have ſcrupulouſly followed Dr. Johnſon. His Dictionary has been deemed lawful plunder by every ſubſequent lexicographer; and ſo ſervilely has it been copied, that ſuch words as he muſt have omitted merely by miſtake, as Predilection, Reſpectable, Deſcriptive, Sulky, Inimical, Interference, and many others, are neither in Mr. Sheridan's, Dr. Kenrick's, nor ſeveral other Dictionaries.

*The inſpector will be pleaſed to take notice, that my obſervations on Mr. Sheridan relate to the firſt edition, publiſhed in his lifetime, and the ſecond, ſome time after his death. whatever alterations may have been made by his ſubſequent editors, I am totally unacquainted with.

Rules to be obſerved by the Natives of IRELAND in order to obtain a juſt Pronunciation of Engliſh.

AS Mr. Sheridan was a native of Ireland, and had the beſt opportunities of underſtanding thoſe peculiarities of pronunciation which obtain there, I ſhall extract his obſervations on that ſubject as the beſt general direction, and add a few of my own, by way of ſupplement, which I hope will render this article of inſtruction ſtill more complete.

The reader will be pleaſed to take notice, that as I have made a different arrangement of the vowels, and have adopted a notation different from Mr. Sheridan, I am obliged to make uſe of different figures to mark the vowels, but ſtill ſuch as perfectly correſpond to his.

" The chief miſtakes made by the Iriſh in pronouncing " Engliſh, lie for the moſt part in the ſounds of the two " firſt vowels, a and e; the former being generally ſounded " å by the Iriſh, as in the word bȧr, in moſt words where " it is pronounced å, as in day, by the Engliſh. Thus " the Iriſh ſay, pȧtron, mȧtron, the vowel ȧ having the " ſame ſound as in the word fȧther; whilſt the Engliſh " pronounce them as if written paytron, maytron. The " following rule, ſtrictly attended to, will rectify this " miſtake through the whole language.

" When the vowel a finiſhes a ſyllable, and has the " accent on it, it is invariably pronounced å [day] by the " Engliſh. To this rule there are but three exceptions in " the whole language to be found in the words fȧther, " papȧ, mamȧ. The Iriſh may think alſo the word rather " an exception, as well as father; and ſo it would appear " to be in their manner of pronouncing it rȧ-ther, laying " the accent on the vowel a; but in the Engliſh pronun- " ciation the conſonant th is taken into the firſt ſyllable, as " thus, rath'er, which makes the difference.

" Whenever a conſonant follows the vowel a in the " ſame ſyllable, and the accent is on the conſonant, the " vowel a has always its fourth ſound, as hȧt, mȧn; as " alſo the ſame ſound lengthened when it precedes the " letter r, as fȧr, bȧr, though the accent be on the vowel; " as likewiſe when it precedes lm, as bȧlm, pſȧlm. The " Iriſh, ignorant of this latter exception, pronounce all " words of that ſtructure as if they were written hawm, " pſawm, quawm, cawm, &c. In the third ſound of a, " marked by different combinations of vowels, or conſo- " nants, ſuch as au, in Paul; aw, in law; all, in call; " ald, in bald; alk, in talk, &c. the Iriſh make no miſ- " take, except in that of lm, as before mentioned.

" The ſecond vowel, e, is for the moſt part ſounded ee " by the Engliſh, when the accent is upon it; whilſt the " Iriſh in moſt words give it the ſound of ſlender å, as in " hate. This ſound of ė [ee] is marked by different " combinations of vowels, ſuch as ea, ei, e final mute, ee, " and ie. In the two laſt combinations of ee and ie, the " Iriſh never miſtake; ſuch as in meet, ſeem, field, believe, " &c.; but in all the others, they almoſt univerſally " change the ſound of ė into å. Thus in the combination " ea, they pronounce the words tea, ſea, pleaſe, as if they " were ſpelt tay, ſay, plays; inſtead of tee, ſee, pleeſe. The " Engliſh conſtantly give this ſound to ea whenever the " accent is on the vowel e, except in the following words, " great, a pear, a bear, to bear, to forbear, to ſwear, to tear, " to wear. In all which the e has the ſound of å in hȧte. " For want of knowing theſe exceptions, the gentlemen of " Ireland, after ſome time of reſidence in London, are apt " to fall into the general rule, and pronounce theſe words " as if ſpelt greet, beer, ſwear, &c.

" Ei is alſo ſounded ee by the Engliſh, and as å by the " Iriſh; thus the word de*ceit*, re*ceive*, are pronounced by " them as if written de*ſate*, re*ſave*. Ei is always ſounded " ee, except when a g follows it, as in the words reign, " feign, deign, &c.; as alſo in the words rein (of a bridle), " rein-deer, vein, drein, veil, heir, which are prunounced " like rain, vain, drain, vail, air.

" The final mute e makes the preceding e in the ſame " ſyllable, when accented, have the ſound of ee, as in the " words ſupr*ė*me, finc*ė*re, repl*ė*te. This rule is almoſt " univerſally broken through by the Iriſh, who pronounce " all ſuch words as if written ſupr*å*me, finc*å*re, repl*å*te. " &c. There are but two exceptions to this rule in the " Engliſh pronunciation, which are the words there, " where.

" In the way of marking this ſound, by a double e, as " thus ee, as the Iriſh never make any miſtakes, the beſt " method for all who want to acquire the right pronunci- " ation of theſe ſeveral combinations is, to ſuppoſe that ea, " ei, and e, attended by a final mute e, are all ſpelt with a " double e, or ee.

" Ey is always ſounded like å by the Engliſh, when the " accent is upon it; as in the words prey, convey, pro- " nounced pray, convay. To this there are but two ex- " ceptions, in the words k*ė*y and l*ė*y, ſounded kee, lee. " The Iriſh, in attempting to pronounce like the Engliſh, " often give the ſame ſound to ey, as uſually belongs to ei; " thus for prey, convey, they ſay, pree, convee.

" A ſtrict obſervation of theſe few rules, with a due at- " tention to the very few exceptions enumerated above, " will enable the well-educated natives of Ireland to " pronounce their words exactly in the ſame way as the " more poliſhed part of the inhabitants of England do, ſo " far as the vowels are concerned. The diphthongs they " commit no fault in, except in the ſound of ī, which has " been already taken notice of in the Grammar *; where,

* " Vide p. 11, where the true manner of pronouncing the " diphthong i is pointed out; the Iriſh pronouncing it much in " the ſame manner as the French.

" likewiſe, the only difference in pronouncing any of the " conſonants has been pointed out; which is, the thick- " ening the ſounds of d and t, in certain ſituations; and " an eaſy method propoſed of correcting this habit *.

" In order to complete the whole, I ſhall now give a " liſt of ſuch detached words, that do not come under any " of the above rules, as are pronounced differently in " Ireland from what they are in England:

" These, after the cloſeſt attention, are all the words, " not included in the rules before laid down, that I have " been able to collect, in which the well-educated natives " of Ireland differ from thoſe of England."

I ſhall make no obſervations on the accuracy of this liſt, but deſire my reader to obſerve, that the ſtrongeſt characteriſtics of the pronunciation of Ireland is the rough jarring pronunciation of the letter R, and the aſpiration or rough breathing before all the accented vowels. For the true ſound of R, ſee that letter in the Principles, No. 419. And for the rough breathing or aſpiration of the vowels, the pupil ſhould be told not to bring the voice ſuddenly from the breaſt, but to ſpeak, as it were, from the mouth only.

It may be obſerved too, that the natives of Ireland pronounce rm at the end of a word ſo diſtinctly as to form two ſeparate ſyllables. Thus ſtorm and farm ſeem ſounded by them as if written ſtaw-rum, fa-rum; while the Engliſh ſound the r ſo ſoft and ſo cloſe to the m, that it ſeems pronounced nearly as if written ſtawm, faam.

Nearly the ſame obſervations are applicable to lm. When theſe letters end a word they are, in Ireland, pronounced at ſuch a diſtance, that helm and realm ſound as if written hel-um and real-um; but in England the l and m are pronounced as cloſe as poſſible, and ſo as to form but one ſyllable. To remedy this, it will be neceſſary for the pupil to make a collection of words terminating with theſe conſonants, and to practiſe them over till a true pronunciation is acquired.

* " The letter d has always the ſame ſound by thoſe who pro- " nounce Engliſh well; but the Provincials, particularly the " Iriſh, Scotch, and Welſh, in many words thicken the ſound by " a mixture of breath. Thus though they ſound the d right " in the poſitive loud and broad, in the comparative degree they " thicken it by an aſpiration, and ſound it as if it were written " loudher, broadher. This vicious pronunciation is produced by " puſhing the tongue forward ſo as to touch the teeth in form- " ing that ſound; and the way to cure it is eaſy; for as they can " pronounce the d properly in the word loud, let them reſt a " little upon that ſyllable, keeping the tongue in the poſition of " forming d, and then let them ſeparate it from the upper gum " without puſhing it forward, and the ſound der will be pro- " duced of courſe: for the organ being left in the poſition of " ſounding d at the end of the ſyllable loud, is neceſſarily in the " poſition of forming the ſame d in uttering the laſt ſyllable, " unleſs it makes a new movement, as in the caſe of protrud- " ing it ſo as to touch the teeth. This letter is ſometimes, " though not often, quieſcent, as in the words handkerchief, hand- " ſome, handſel.

" In pronouncing the letter t the Iriſh and other Provincials " thicken the ſound, as was before mentioned with regard to " the d; for better, they ſay betther; for utter, utther; and ſo on " in all words of that ſtructure. This faulty manner ariſes " from the ſame cauſe that was mentioned as affecting the ſound " of the d; I mean the protruding of the tongue ſo as to touch " the teeth, and is curable only in the ſame way."

Rules to be obſerved by the Natives of SCOTLAND for attaining a juſt Pronunciation of Engliſh.

THAT pronunciation which diſtinguiſhes the inhabitants of Scotland is of a very different kind from that of Ireland, and may be divided into the quantity, quality, and accentuation, of the vowels. With reſpect to quantity, it may be obſerved, that the Scotch pronounce almoſt all their accented vowels long. Thus, if I am not miſtaken, they would pronounce habit, hay-bit; tepid, tee-pid; ſinner, ſee-ner; conſcious, cone-ſhus: and ſubject, ſoob-ject *: it is not pretended, however, that every accented vowel is ſo pronounced, but that ſuch a pronunciation is very general, and particularly of the i. This vowel is ſhort in Engliſh pronunciation where the other vowels are long; thus evaſion, adheſion, emotion, confuſion, have the a, e, o, and u, long; and in theſe inſtances the Scotch would pronounce them like the Engliſh; but in viſion, deciſion, &c. where the Engliſh pronounce the i ſhort, the Scotch lengthen this letter by pronouneing it like ee, as if the words were written vee-ſion, decee-ſion, &c. and this peculiarity is univerſal. The beſt way, therefore, to correct this, will be to make a collection of the moſt uſual words which have the vowel ſhort, and to pronounce them daily till a habit is formed. See Principles, No. 507.

With reſpect to the quality of the vowels, it may be obſerved, that the inhabitants of Scotland are apt to pronounce the a like aw, where the Engliſh give it the ſlender ſound: thus Satan is pronounced Sawtan, and fatal, fawtal. It may be remarked too, that the Scotch give this ſound to the a preceded by w, according to the general rule, without attending to the exceptions, Principles, No. 88; and thus, inſtead of making wax, waſt, aud twang, rhyme with tax, ſhaft, and hang, they pronounce them ſo as to rhyme with box, ſoft and ſong. The ſhort e in bed, fed, red, &c. borders too much upon the Engliſh ſound of a in bad, lad, mad, &c. and the ſhort i in bid, lid, rid, too much on the Engliſh ſound of e in bed, led, red. To correct this error, it would be uſeful to collect the long and ſhort ſounds of theſe vowels, and to pronounce the long ones firſt, and to ſhorten them by degrees till they are perfectly ſhort; at the ſame time preſerving the radical ſound of the vowel in both. Thus the correſpondent long ſounds to the e in bed, fed, red, are bade, fade, rade, and that of the ſhort i in bid, lid, rid, are bead, lead, reed; and the former of theſe claſſes will naturally lead the ear to the true ſound of the latter, the only difference lying in the quantity. The ſhort o in not, lodge, got, &c. is apt to ſlide into the ſhort u, as if the words were written nut, ludge, gut, &c. To rectify this, it ſhould be remembered, that this o is the ſhort ſound of aw, and ought to have the radical ſound of the deep a in ball. Thus the radical ſound correſponding to the o in not, cot, ſot, is found in naught, caught, ſought, &c. and theſe long ſounds, like the former, ſhould be abbreviated into the ſhort ones. But what will tend greatly to clear the difficulty will be, to remember that only thoſe words which are collected in the Principles, No. 165, have the o ſounded like ſhort u when the accent is upon it: and with reſpect to u, in bull, full, pull, &c. it may be obſerved, that the pronunciation peculiar to the Engliſh is only found in the words enumerated, Principles, No. 174.

In addition to what has been ſaid, it may be obſerved, that oo in food, mood, moon, ſoon, &c. which ought always to have a long ſound, is generally ſhortened in Scotland to that middle ſound of the u in bull; and it muſt be remembered, that wool, wood, good, hood, ſtood, foot, are the only words where this ſound of oo ought to take place.

The accentuation, both in Scotland and Ireland, (if by accentuation we mean the ſtreſs, and not the kind of ſtreſs) is ſo much the ſame as that of England, that I cannot recollect many words in which they differ. Indeed, if it were not ſo, the verſification of each country would be different: for as Engliſh verſe is formed by accent or ſtreſs, if this accent or ſtreſs were upon different ſyllables in different countries, what is verſe in England would not be verſe in Scotland or Ireland; and this ſufficiently ſhows how very indefinitely the word accent is generally uſed.

Mr. Elphinſton, who muſt be allowed to be a competent judge in this caſe, tells us, that in Scotland they pronounce ſilénce, biás, canvás, ſenténce, triúmph, comfórt, ſoláce, conſtrúe, reſcúe, reſpíte, govérn, harráſs, ransáck, cancél, with the accent on the laſt ſyllable inſtead of the firſt. To this liſt may be added the word menace, which they pronounce as if written menáſs; and though they place the

* That this is the general mode of pronouncing theſe words in Scotland, is indiſputable; and it is highly probable that the Scotch have preſerved the old Engliſh pronunciation, from which the Engliſh themſelves have inſenſibly departed. Dr. Hicks obſerved long ago, that the Scotch Saxoniſed in their language much more than the Engliſh; and it is ſcarcely to be doubted that a ſituation nearer to the Continent, and a greater commercial intercourſe with other nations, made the Engliſh admit of numberleſs changes which never extended to Scotland. About the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the Greek and Latin languages were cultivated, and the pedantry of ſhewing an acquaintance with them became faſhionable, it is not improbable that an alteration in the quantity of many words took place: for as in Latin almoſt every vowel before a ſingle conſonant is ſhort, ſo in Engliſh almoſt every vowel in the ſame ſituation was ſuppoſed to be long, or our anceſtors would not have doubled the conſonant in the participles of verbs to prevent the preceding vowel from lengthening. But when once this affectation of Latinity was adopted, it is no wonder it ſhould extend beyond its principles, and ſhorten ſeveral vowels in Engliſh, becauſe they were ſhort in the original Latin; and in this manner, perhaps, might the diverſity between the quantity of the Engliſh and Scotch pronunciation ariſe, (542) (543). See DRAMA.

accent on the laſt ſyllable of canal, like the Engliſh, they broaden the a in the laſt ſyllable, as if the word were ſpelt canawl. It may be farther obſerved, that they place an accent on the comparative adverb as, in the phraſes as much, as little, as many, as great, &c. while the Engliſh, except in ſome very particular emphatical caſes, lay no ſtreſs on this word, but pronounce theſe phraſes like words of two or three ſyllables without any accent on the firſt.

But beſides the miſpronunciation of ſingle words, there is a tone of voice with which theſe words are accompanied, that diſtinguiſhes a native of Ireland or Scotland as much as an improper ſound of the letters. This is vulgarly, and, if it does not mean ſtreſs only, but the kind of ſtreſs, I think, not improperly called the accent *. For though there is an aſperity in the Iriſh dialect, and a drawl in the Scotch, independent of the ſlides or inflexions they make uſe of, yet it may with confidence be affirmed, that much of the peculiarity which diſtinguiſhes theſe dialects may be reduced to a predominant uſe of one of theſe ſlides. Let any one who has ſufficiently ſtudied the ſpeaking voice to diſtinguiſh the ſlides, obſerve the pronunciation of an Iriſhman and a Scotchman, who have much of the dialect of their country, and he will find that the former abounds with the falling, and the latter with the riſing inflexion †; and if this is the caſe, a teacher, if he underſtands theſe ſlides, ought to direct his inſtruction ſo as to remedy the imperfection. But as avoiding the wrong, and ſeizing the right at the ſame inſtant, is, perhaps, too great a taſk for human powers, I would adviſe a native of Ireland, who has much of the accent, to pronounce almoſt all his words, and end all his ſentences with the riſing ſlide; and a Scotchman in the ſame manner, to uſe the falling inflexion; this will, in ſome meaſure, counteract the natural propenſity, and bids fairer for bringing the pupil to that nearly equal mixture of both ſlides which diſtinguiſhes the Engliſh ſpeaker, than endeavouring at firſt to catch the agreeable variety. For this purpoſe the teacher ought to pronounce all the ſingle words in the leſſon with the falling inflexion to a Scotchman, and with the riſing to an Iriſhman; and ſhould frequently give the pauſes in a ſentence the ſame inflexions to each of theſe pupils, where he would vary them to a native of England. But while the human voice remains unſtudied, there is little expectation that this diſtinction of the ſlides ſhould be applied to theſe uſeful purpoſes.

Beſides a peculiarity of inflexion, which I take to be a falling circumflex, directly oppoſite to that of the Scotch, the Welch pronounce the ſharp conſonants and aſpirations inſtead of the flat. (See Principles, No. 29, 41.) Thus for big they ſay pick; for blood, ploot; and for good, coot. Inſtead of virtue and vice, they ſay firtue and fice; inſtead of zeal and praiſe, they ſay ſeal and prace; inſtead of theſe and thoſe, they ſay thece and thoce; and inſtead of azure and oſier, they ſay ayſher and oſher; and for jail, chail. Thus there are nine diſtinct conſonant ſounds which, to the Welch, are entirely uſeleſs. To ſpeak with propriety, therefore, the Welch ought for ſome time to pronounce the flat conſonants and aſpirations only; that is, they ought not only to pronounce them where the letters require the flat ſound, but even where they require the ſharp ſound; this will be the beſt way to acquire a habit; and when this is once done, a diſtinction will be eaſily made, and a juſt pronunciation more readily acquired.

There is ſcarcely any part of England remote from the capital where a different ſyſtem of pronunciation does not prevail. As in Wales they pronounce the ſharp conſonants for the flat, ſo in Somerſetſhire they pronounce many of the flat inſtead of the ſharp. Thus for Somerſetſhire, they ſay Zomerzetſhire; for father, vather; for think, THink; and for ſure, zhure *.

There are dialects peculiar to Cornwall, Lancaſhire, Yorkſhire, and every diſtant county in England; but as a conſideration of theſe would lead to a detail too minute for the preſent occaſion, I ſhall conclude theſe remarks with a few obſervations on the peculiarities of my countrymen, the Cockneys; who, as they are the models of pronunciation to the diſtant provinces, ought to be the more ſcrupulouſly correct.

First Fault of the Londoners.

Pronouncing s indiſtinctly after ſt.

The letter s after ſt, from the very difficulty of its pronunciation, is often ſounded inarticulately. The inhabitants of London, of the lower order, cut the knot, and pronounce it in a diſtinct ſyllable, as if e were before it; but this is to be avoided as the greateſt blemiſh in ſpeaking: the three laſt letters in poſts, fiſts, miſts, &c. muſt all be diſtinctly heard in one ſyllable, and without permitting the letters to coaleſce. For the acquiring of this ſound, it will be proper to ſelect nouns that end in ſt or ſte; to form them into plurals, and pronounce them forcibly and diſtinctly every day. The ſame may be obſerved of the third perſon of verbs ending in ſts or ſtes, as perſiſts, waſtes, haſtes, &c.

Second Fault.

Pronouncing w for v, and inverſely.

The pronunciation of v for w, and more frequently of w for v, among the inhabitants of London, and thoſe not always of the lower order, is a blemiſh of the firſt magnitude. The difficulty of remedying this defect is the greater,

* See this more fully exemplified in Elements of Elocution, Vol. II. page 13.

† Or rather the riſing circumflex. For an explanation of this inflexion, ſee Melody of Speaking Delineated, page 16.

* See the word Change.

as the cure of one of theſe miſtakes has a tendency to promote the other.

Thus, if you are very careful to make a pupil pronounce veal and vinegar, not as if written weal and winegar, you will find him very apt to pronounce wine and wind, as if written vine and vind. The only method of rectifying this habit ſeems to be this: Let the pupil ſelect from a dictionary, not only all the words that begin with v, but as many as he can of thoſe that have this letter in any other part. Let him be told to bite his under lip while he is ſounding the v in thoſe words, and to practiſe this every day till he pronounces the v properly at firſt ſight: then, and not till then, let him purſue the ſame method with the w; which he muſt be directed to pronounce by a pouting out of the lips without ſuffering them to touch the teeth. Thus by giving all the attention to only one of theſe letters at a time, and fixing by habit the true ſound of that, we ſhall at laſt find both of them reduced to their proper pronunciation in a ſhorter time than by endeavouring to rectify them both at once.

Third Fault.

Not ſounding h after w.

The aſpirate h is often ſunk, particularly in the capital, where we do not find the leaſt diſtinction of ſound between while and wile, whet and wet, where and were, &c. The beſt method to rectify this is, to collect all the words of this deſcription from a dictionary, and write them down; and inſtead of the wh to begin them with hoo in a diſtinct ſyllable, and ſo to pronounce them. Thus let while be written and ſounded hoo-ile; whet, hoo-et; where, hoo-are; whip, hoo-ip, &c. This is no more, as Dr. Lowth obſerves, than placing the aſpirate in its true poſition before the w, as it is in the Saxon, which the words come from; where we may obſerve, that though we have altered the orthography of our anceſtors, we have ſtill preſerved their pronunciation.

Fourth Fault.

Not ſounding h where it ought to be ſounded, and inverſely.

A ſtill worſe habit than the laſt prevails, chiefly among the people of London, that of ſinking the h at the beginning of words where it ought to be ſounded, and of ſounding it, either where it is not ſeen, or where it ought to be ſunk. This we not unfrequently hear, eſpecially among children heart pronounced art, and arm, harm. This is a vice perfectly ſimilar to that of pronouncing the v for the w, and the w for the v, and requires a ſimilar method to correct it.

As there are ſo very few words in the language where the initial h is ſunk, we may ſelect theſe from the reſt, and, without ſetting the pupil right when he miſpronounces theſe, or when he prefixes the h improperly to other words, we may make him pronounce all the words where h is ſounded, till he has almoſt forgot there are any words pronounced otherwiſe. Then he may go over thoſe words to which he improperly prefixes the h, and thoſe where the h is ſeen but not ſounded, without any danger of an interchange. As theſe latter words are but few, I ſhall ſubjoin a catalogue of them for the uſe of the learner. Heir, heireſs, herb, herbage, honeſt, honeſty, honeſtly, honour, honourable, honourably, hoſpital, hoſtler, hour, hourly, humble, humbly, humbles, humour, humouriſt, humorous, humorouſly, humourſome. Where we may obſerve, that humour and its compounds not only ſink the h, but ſound the u like the pronoun you, or the noun yew, as if written yewmour, yewmorous, &c.

Thus I have endeavoured to correct ſome of the more glaring errors of my countrymen; who with all their faults, are ſtill upon the whole the beſt pronouncers of the Engliſh language. For though the pronunciation of London is certainly erroneous in many words, yet, upon being compared with that of any other place, it is undoubtedly the beſt; that is, not only the beſt by courteſy, and becauſe it happens to be the pronunciation of the capital, but beſt by a better title; that of being more generally received: or, in other words, though the people of London are erroneous in the pronunciation of many words, the inhabitants of every other place are erroneous in many more. Nay, harſh as the ſentence may ſeem, thoſe at a conſiderable diſtance from the capital do not only miſpronounce many words taken ſeparately, but they ſcarcely pronounce with purity a ſingle word, ſyllable, or letter. Thus, if the ſhort ſound of the letter u in trunk, ſunk, &c. differ from the ſound of that letter in the northern parts of England, where they ſound it like the u in bull, and nearly as if the words were written troonk, ſoonk, &c. it neceſſarily follows that every word where that letter occurs muſt by thoſe provincials be miſpronounced.

But though the inhabitants of London have this manifeſt advantage over all the other inhabitants of the iſland, they have the diſadvantage of being more diſgraced by their peculiarities than any other people. The grand difference between the metropolis and the provinces is, that people of education in London are generally free from the vices of the vulgar; but the beſt educated people in the provinces, if conſtantly reſident there, are ſure to be ſtrongly tinctured with the dialect of the country in which they live. Hence it is, that the vulgar pronunciation of London, though not half ſo erroneous as that of Scotland, Ireland, or any of the provinces, is, to a perſon of correct taſte, a thouſand times more offenſive and diſguſting.

DIRECTIONS to FOREIGNERS,

In order to attain a Knowledge of the Marks in this Dictionary, and to acquire a right Pronunciation of every Word in the Engliſh Language.

AS the ſounds of the vowels are different in different languages, it would be endleſs to bring parallel ſounds from the various languages of Europe; but as the French is ſo generally underſtood upon the Continent, if we can reduce the ſounds of the Engliſh letters to thoſe of the French, we ſhall render the pronunciation of our language very generally attainable: and this, it is preſumed, will be pretty accurately accompliſhed by obſerving the following directions:

A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J	K	L	M	N	O	P
ei	bi	ci	di	i	ef	dgi	etch	aï	djé	qué	ell	em	en	o	pi

Q	R	S	T	U	V	W	X	Y	Z
kiou	arr	eſs	ti	iou	vi	dobliou	ex	ouai	zedd

The French have all our vowel ſounds, and will therefore find the pronunciation of them very eaſy. The only difficulty they will meet with ſeems to be i, which, though demonſtrably compoſed of two ſucceſſive ſounds, has paſſed for a ſimple vowel with a very competent judge of Engliſh pronunciation *. The reaſon is, theſe two ſounds are pronounced ſo cloſely together as to require ſome attention to diſcover their component parts: this attention Mr. Sheridan † never gave, or he would not have told us that this diphthong is a compound of our fulleſt and ſlendereſt ſounds ä and ē; the firſt made by the largeſt, and the laſt by the ſmalleſt aperture of the mouth. Now nothing is more certain than the inaccuracy of this definition. The third ſound of a, which is perfectly equivalent to the third ſound of o, when combined with the firſt ſound of e, muſt inevitably form the diphthong in boy, joy, &c. and not the diphthongal ſound of the vowel i in idle, and the perſonal pronoun I; this double ſound will, upon a cloſe examination, be found to be compoſed of the Italian a in the laſt ſyllable of papa, and the firſt ſound of e, pronounced as cloſely together as poſſible ‡; and for the exactneſs of this definition, I appeal to every juſt Engliſh ear in the kingdom.

The other diphthongal vowel u is compoſed of the French i, pronounced as cloſely as poſſible to their diphthong ou, or the Engliſh ēē and o͝o, perfectly equivalent to the ſound the French would give to the letters you, and which is exactly the ſound the Engliſh give to the plural of the ſecond perſonal pronoun.

The diphthong oi or oy is compoſed of the French â and i; thus toy and boy would be exactly expreſſed to a Frenchman by writing them tâi and bâi.

The diphthongs ou and ow, when ſounded like ou, are compoſed of the French â and the diphthong ou; and the Engliſh ſounds of thou and now may be expreſſed to a Frenchman by ſpelling them thâou and nâou.

W is no more than the French diphthong ou; thus Weſt is equivalent to Oueſt, and wall to ouâll.

Y is perfectly equivalent to the French letter of that name, and may be ſupplied by i; thus yoke, you, &c. is expreſſed by ioke, iou, &c.

J, or I conſonant, muſt be pronounced by prefixing d to the French j; thus jay, joy, &c. ſound to a Frenchman as if ſpelled djé, djâi, &c. If any difficulty be found in forming this combination of ſounds, it will be removed by pronouncing the d, ed, and ſpelling theſe words edjé, edjâi, &c.

Ch, in Engliſh words not derived from the Greek, Latin, or French, is pronounced as if t were prefixed; thus the ſound of chair, cheeſe, chain, &c. would be underſtood by a Frenchman if the words were written tchére, tchize, tchéne.

Sh in Engliſh is expreſſed by ch in French; thus ſhame, ſhare, &c. would be ſpelled by a Frenchman chéme, chére, &c.

The ringing ſound ng in long, ſong, &c. may be perfectly conceived by a pupil who can pronounce the French word Encore, as the firſt ſyllable of this word is exactly correſpondent to the ſound in thoſe Engliſh words; and for the formation of it, ſee Principles, No. 57; alſo the word ENCORE.

But the greateſt difficulty every foreigner finds in pronouncing Engliſh, is the liſping conſonant th. This, it may be obſerved, has, like the other conſonants, a ſharp and flat ſound: ſharp as in thin, bath; flat as in that, with. To acquire a true pronunciation of this difficult combination, it may be proper to begin with thoſe words where it is initial: and firſt, let the pupil protrude his tongue a little way beyond the teeth, and preſs it between them as if going to bite the tip of it; while this is doing, if he wiſhes to pronounce thin, let him hiſs as if to ſound the letter s; and after the hiſs, let him draw back his tongue within his teeth, and pronounce the prepoſition in, and thus will the word thin be perfectly pronounced. If he would pronounce that, let him place the tongue between the teeth as before; and while he is hiſſing as to ſound the letter z, let him withdraw his tongue into his mouth, and immediately pronounce the prepoſition at. To pronounce this combination when final in bath, let him pronounce ba, and protrude the tongue beyond the teeth, preſſing the tongue with them, and hiſſing as if to ſound s; if he would pronounce with, let him firſt form wi, put the tongue in the ſame poſition as before, and hiſs as if to ſound z. It will be proper to make the pupil dwell ſome time with the tongue beyond the teeth in order to form a habit, and to pronounce daily ſome words out of a dictionary beginning and ending with theſe letters.

‡ Holder, the moſt philoſophical and accurate inveſtigator of the formation and powers of the letters, ſays: "Our vulgar i, as in ſtile, ſeems to be ſuch a diphthong, (or rather "ſyllable, or part of a ſyllable,) compoſed of a, i, or e, i, "and not a ſimple original vowel." Elements of Speech, page 95.

Dr. Wallis, ſpeaking of the long Engliſh i, ſays it is founded "eodem ferè modo quo Gallorum ai in vocibus main, manus; "pain, panis, &c. Nempe ſonum habet compoſitum ex Gallo-"rum è fœminino & i vel y." Grammatica Linguæ Anglicanæ, pag. 48.

Theſe directions, it is preſumed, if properly attended to, will be ſufficient to give ſuch Foreigners as underſtand French, and have not acceſs to a maſter, a competent knowledge of Engliſh pronunciation; but to render the ſounds of the vowels marked by figures in this Dictionary ſtill more eaſily to be comprehended—with thoſe Engliſh words which exemplify the ſounds of the vowels, I have aſſociated ſuch French words as have vowels exactly correſponding to them, and which immediately convey the true Engliſh pronunciation. Theſe ſhould be committed to memory, or written down and held in his hand while the pupil is inſpecting the Dictionary.

Perhaps the greateſt advantage to foreigners and provincials will be derived from the claſſification of words of a ſimilar ſound, and drawing the line between the general rule and the exception. This has been an arduous taſk; but it is hoped the benefit ariſing from it will amply repay it. When the numerous varieties of ſounds annexed to vowels, diphthongs, and conſonants, lie ſcattered without bounds, a learner is bewildered and diſcouraged from attempting to diſtinguiſh them; but when they are all claſſed, arranged, and enumerated, the variety ſeems leſs, the number ſmaller, and the diſtinction eaſier. What an inextricable labyrinth do the diphthongs ea and ou form as they lie looſe in the language! but claſſed and arranged as we find them, No. 226, &c. and 313, &c. the confuſion vaniſhes, they become much leſs formidable, and a learner has it in his power, by repeating them daily, to become maſter of them all in a very little time.

The Engliſh accent is often an unſurmountable obſtacle to foreigners, as the rules for it are ſo various, and the exceptions ſo numerous; but let the inſpector conſult the article Accent in the Principles, particularly No. 492, 505, 506, &c. and he will ſoon perceive how much of our language is regularly accented, and how much that which is irregular is facilitated by an enumeration of the greater number of exceptions.

But ſcarcely any method will be ſo uſeful for gaining the Engliſh accent as the reading of verſe. This will naturally lead the ear to the right accentuation; and though a different poſition of the accent is frequently to be met with in the beginning of a verſe, there is a ſufficient regularity to render the pronouncing of verſe a powerful means of obtaining ſuch a diſtinction of force and feebleneſs as is commonly called the accent. For it may be obſerved, that a foreigner is no leſs diſtinguiſhable by placing an accent upon certain worlds to which the Engliſh give no ſtreſs, than by placing the ſtreſs upon a wrong ſyllable. Thus if a foreigner, when he calls for bread at table, by ſaying, give me ſome bread, lays an equal ſtreſs upon every word, though every word ſhould be pronounced with its exact ſound, we immediately perceive he is not a native. An Engliſhman would pronounce theſe four words like two, with the accent on the firſt ſyllable of the firſt, and on the laſt ſyllable of the laſt, as if written gíveme ſomebréad; or rather gívme ſumbréd: or more commonly, though vulgarly, gímme ſomebréd. Verſe may ſometimes induce a foreigner, as it does ſometimes injudicious natives, to lay the accent on a ſyllable in long words which ought to have none, as in a couplet of Pope's Eſſay on Criticiſm:

> "Falſe eloquence, like the priſmatic glaſs,
> "Its gaudy colours ſpreads on every place."

Here a foreigner would be apt to place an accent on the laſt ſyllable of eloquence as well as the firſt, which would be certainly wrong; but this fault is ſo trifling, when compared with that of laying the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, that it almoſt vaniſhes from obſervation; and this miſaccentuation, verſe will generally guard him from. The reading of verſe, therefore, will, if I am not miſtaken, be found a powerful regulator, both of accent and emphaſis.

PRINCIPLES

ENGLISH PRONUNCIATION.

1. THE firſt principles or elements of pronunciation are letters:

The letters of the Engliſh language are:

Roman.	Italick.	Name.
A a	A a	a
B b	B b	bee
C c	C c	ſee
D d	D d	dee
F f	F f	eff
G g	G g	jee
H h	H h	aitch
I i	I i	i or eye
J j	J j	j conſonant, or jay
K k	K k	kay
L l	L l	el
M m	M m	em
N n	N n	en
O o	O o	o
P p	P p	pee
Q q	Q q	cue
R r	R r	ar
S ſ s	S ſ s	eſs
T t	T t	tee
U u	U u	u or you
V v	V v	v conſonant, or vee
W w	W w	double u
X x	X x	eks
Y y	Y y	uy
Z z	Z z	zed, or izzard. (483).

2. To theſe may be added certain combinations of letters univerſally uſed in printing; as ct, ſt, fl, ſl, ſb, ſk, ff, ffl, fi, ffi, fi, ffi, ffl, and &, or and per ſe and, or rather et per ſe and. ct, ſt, ſt, ſl, ſb, ſk, ff, ffl, ſi, ffi, fi, ffi, ffl, &.

3. Our letters, ſays Dr. Johnſon, are commonly reckoned twenty-four, becauſe anciently i and j, as well as u and v, were expreſſed by the ſame character; but as theſe letters, which had always different powers, have now different forms, our alphabet may be properly ſaid to conſiſt of twenty-ſix letters.

4. In conſidering the ſounds of theſe firſt principles of language, we find that ſome are ſo ſimple and unmixed, that there is nothing required but the opening of the mouth to make them underſtood, and to form different ſounds. Whence they have the names of vowels, or voices or vocal ſounds. On the contrary, we find that there are others, whoſe pronunciation depends on the particular application and uſe of every part of the mouth, as the teeth, the lips, the tongue, the palate, &c. which yet cannot make any one perfect ſound but by their union with thoſe vocal ſounds; and theſe are called conſonants, or letters ſounding with other letters.

Definition of Vowels and Conſonants.

5. Vowels are generally reckoned to be five in number; namely, a, e, i, o, u; y and w are called vowels when they end a ſyllable or word, and conſonants when they begin one.

6. The definition of a vowel, as little liable to exception as any, ſeems to be the following: A vowel is a ſimple ſound formed by a continued effuſion of the breath, and a certain conformation of the mouth, without any alteration in the poſition, or any motion of the organs of ſpeech, from the moment the vocal ſound commences till it ends.

7. A conſonant may be defined to be, an interruption of the effuſion of vocal ſound, ariſing from the application of the organs of ſpeech to each other.

8. Agreeably to this definition, vowels may be divided into two kinds, the ſimple and compound. The ſimple a, e, o, are thoſe which are formed by one conformation of the organs only; that is, the organs remain exactly in the ſame poſition at the end as at the beginning of the letter; whereas in the compound vowels i and u, the organs alter their poſition before the letter is completely ſounded. Nay, theſe letters, when commencing a ſyllable, do not only require a different poſition of the organs in order to form them perfectly, but demand ſuch an application of the tongue to the roof of the mouth, as is inconſiſtent with the nature of a pure vowel; for the firſt of theſe letters, i, when ſounded alone, or ending a ſyllable with the accent upon it, is a real diphthong, compoſed of the ſound of a in father, and of e in the, exactly correſpondent to the ſound of the noun eye; and when this letter commences a ſyllable, as in min-ion, pin-ion, &c. the ſound of e with which it terminates is ſqueezed into a conſonant ſound, like the double e heard in queen, different from the ſimple ſound of that letter in quean, and this ſqueezed ſound in the commencing i makes it exactly ſimilar to y in the ſame ſituation; which, by all grammarians, is acknowledged to be a conſonant *. The latter of theſe compound vowels, u, when initial, and not ſhortened by a conſonant, commences with this ſqueezed ſound of e equivalent to the y, and ends with a ſound given to oo in woo and coo, which makes its name in the alphabet exactly ſimilar to the pronoun you †. If, therefore, the common definition of a vowel be juſt, theſe two letters are ſo far from being ſimple vowels, that they may more properly be called ſemi-conſonants.

9. That y and w are conſonants when they begin a word, and vowels when they end one, is generally acknowledged by the beſt grammarians; and yet Dr Lowth has told us, that w is equivalent to oo; but if this were the caſe, it would always admit of the particle an before it: for though we have no word in the language which commences with theſe letters, we plainly perceive, that if we had ſuch a word, it would readily admit of an before it, and conſequently that theſe letters are not equivalent to w. Thus we find, that the common opinion, with reſpect to the double capacity of theſe letters, is perfectly juſt.

10. Beſides the vowels already mentioned, there is another ſimple vowel found found under the oo in the words woo and coo; theſe letters have, in theſe two words, every property of a pure vowel, but when found in food, mood, &c. and in the word too, pronounced like the adjective two: here the oo has a ſqueezed ſound, occaſioned by contracting the mouth, ſo as to make the lips nearly touch each other; and this makes it, like the i and u, not ſo much a double vowel as a ſound between a vowel and a conſonant.

Claſſification of Vowels and Conſonants.

11. Vowels and conſonants being thus defined, it will be neceſſary in the next place to arrange them into ſuch claſſes, as their ſimilitudes and ſpecific differences ſeem to require.

12. Letters, therefore, are naturally diviſible into vowels and conſonants.

13. The vowels are a, e, i, o, u; and y and w when ending a ſyllable.

14. The conſonants are b, c, d, f, g, h, j, k, l, m, n, p, q, r, s, t, v, x, z, and y and w when beginning a ſyllable.

15. The vowels may be ſubdivided into ſuch as are ſimple and pure, and into ſuch as are compound and impure. The ſimple or pure vowels are ſuch as require only

* How ſo accurate a grammarian as Dr. Lowth could pronounce ſo definitively on the nature of y, and inſiſt on its being always a vowel, can only be accounted for by conſidering the ſmall attention which is generally paid to this part of grammar. His words are theſe:

"The ſame ſound which we expreſs by the initial y our Saxon anceſtors in many inſtances expreſſed by the vowel e; as eowper, your; and by the vowel i; as iw, yew; iong, young. In the word yew the initial y has preciſely the ſame ſound with i in the words view, lieu, adieu: the i is acknowledged to be a vowel in theſe latter, how then can the y, which has the very ſame ſound, poſſibly be a conſonant in the former? Its initial ſound is generally like that of i in ſhire, or ee nearly; it is formed by the opening of the mouth without any motion or contact of the parts: in a word, it has every property of a vowel and not one of a conſonant." Introd. to Eng. Gram. page 3.

Thus far the learned biſhop; who has too fixed a fame to ſuffer any diminution by a miſtake in ſo trifling a part of literature as this: but it may be aſked if y has every property of a vowel and not one of a conſonant, why, when it begins a word, does it not admit of the euphonic article an before it?

† An ignorance of the real compoſition of u, and a want of knowing that it partook of the nature of a conſonant, has occaſioned a great diverſity and uncertainty in prefixing the indefinite article an before it. Our anceſtors judging of its nature from its name, never ſuſpected that it was not a pure vowel, and conſtantly prefixed the article an before nouns beginning with this letter: as an union, an uſeful book. They were confirmed in this opinion by finding the an always adapted to the ſhort u, as an umpire, an umbrella, without ever dreaming that the ſhort u is a pure vowel, and eſſentially different from the long one. But the moderns, not reſting in the name of a letter, and conſulting their ears rather than their eyes, have frequently placed the a inſtead of an before the long u, and we have ſeen a union, a univerſity, a uſeful book, from ſome of the moſt reſpectable pens of the preſent age. Nor can we doubt a moment of the propriety of this orthography, when we reflect that theſe words actually begin to the ear with y, and might be ſpelled younion, youniverſity, youſeful, and can therefore no more admit of an before them than year and youth. See the article AN in this Dictionary.

16. The compound or impure vowels are such as require more than one conformation of the organs to form them, and a motion in the organs while forming. These observations premised, we may call the following scheme:

An analogical Table of the Vowels.

a	pa-per	simple or pure vowels

o	no-ble

Diphthongs and Triphthongs enumerated.

17. Two vowels forming but one syllable are generally called a diphthong; and three a triphthong. These are the following:

ae Cæsar	eo people	oe œconomy	aye (for ever)
ai aim	eu feud	oi voice	eau beauty ao gaol	ew jewel	oo moon	eou plenteous
au taught	ey they	ou found	ieu adieu
aw law	ia poniard	ow now	iew view
ea clean	ie friend	oy boy
ee reed	io passion	ue manſuetude
ei ceiling	oa coat	ui languid	oeu manœuvre

Consonants enumerated and distinguished into Classes.

18. The consonants are divisible into mutes, semivowels, and liquids.

19. The mutes are such as emit no sound without a vowel, as b, p, t, d, k, and c and g hard.

20. The semi-vowels are such as emit a sound without the concurrence of a vowel, as f, v, s, z, x, g soft or j.

21. The liquids are such as flow into, or unite easily with the mutes, as l, m, n, r.

22. But, besides these, there is another classification of the consonants, of great importance to a just idea of the nature of the letters, and that is, into such as are sharp or flat, and simple or aspirated.

23. The sharp consonants are p, f, t, s, k, c hard.

24. The flat consonants are, b, v, d, z, g hard.

25. The simple consonants are those which have always the sound of one letter unmixed with others, as b, p, f, v, k, g hard, and g soft, or j.

26. The mixed or aspirated consonants are those which have sometimes a hiss or aspiration joined with them, which mingles with the letter, and alters its sound, as t in motion, d in soldier, s in mission, and z in azure.

27. There is another distinction of consonants arising either from the seat of their formation, or from those organs which are chiefly employed in forming them. The best distinction of this kind seems to be that which divides them into labials, dentals, gutturals, and nasals.

28. The labials are, b, p, f, v. The dentals are, t, d, s, z, and soft g or j. The gutturals are, k, q, c hard, and g hard. The nasals are, m, n, and ng.

29. These several properties of the consonants may be exhibited at one view in the following table, which may be called

An analogical Table of the Consonants.

Mute labials	Sharp p, pomp				labio-nasal liquid m
	Flat b, bomb
Hissing labials	Sharp f, if

	Flat the, scythe
Gutturals	Sharp k, kick				guttural liquid r
	Flat g hard, gag

Dento-guttural or nasal ng, hang.

30. Vowels and consonants being thus defined and arranged, we are the better enabled to enter upon an enquiry into their different powers, as they are differently combined with each other. But previous to this, that nothing may be wanting to form a just idea of the first principles of pronunciation, it may not be improper to show the organic formation of each other.

Organic Formation of the Letters.

31. Though I think every mechanical account of the organic formation of the letters rather curious than useful, yet, that nothing which can be presented to the eye may be wanting to inform the ear, I shall in this follow those who have been at the pains to trace every letter to its seat, and make us, as it were, touch the sounds we articulate.

Organic Formation of the Vowels.

32. It will be necessary to observe, that there are three long sounds of the letter a, which are formed by a greater or less expansion of the internal parts of the mouth.

33. The German a, heard in ball, wall, &c. is formed by a ſtrong and grave expreſſion of the breath through the mouth, which is open nearly in a circular form, while the tongue, contracting itſelf to the root, as to make way for the ſound, almoſt reſts upon the under jaw.

34. The Italian a, heard in father, cloſes the mouth a little more than the German a; and by raiſing the lower jaw, widening the tongue, and advancing it a little nearer to the lips, renders its ſound leſs hollow and deep.

35. The ſlender a, or that heard in lane, is formed in the mouth ſtill higher than the laſt; and in pronouncing it, the lips, as if to give it a ſlender ſound, dilate their aperture horizontally; while the tongue, to aſſiſt this narrow emiſſion of breath, widens itſelf to the cheeks, raiſes itſelf nearer the palate, and by theſe means a leſs hollow ſound than either of the former is produced.

36. The e in e-qual, is formed by dilating the tongue a little more, and advancing it nearer to the palate and the lips, which produces the ſlendereſt vowel in the language: for the tongue is, in the formation of this letter, as cloſe to the palate as poſſible, without touching it; as the moment the tongue touches the palate, the ſqueezed ſound of ee in thee and meet is formed, which, by its deſcription, muſt partake of the ſound of the conſonant y.

37. The i in i-dol, is formed by uniting the ſound of the Italian a in father and the e in e-qual, and pronouncing them as cloſely together as poſſible. See Directions to Foreigners at the beginning of this book, page xiv.

38. The o in o-pen, is formed by nearly the ſame poſition of the organs as the a in wa-ter; but the tongue is advanced a little more into the middle of the mouth, the lips are protruded, and form a round aperture like the form of the letter, and the voice is not ſo deep in the mouth as when a is formed, but advances to the middle or hollow of the mouth.

39. The u in u-nit, is formed by uniting the ſqueezed ſound ee to a ſimple vowel ſound, heard in woo and coo; the oo in theſe words is formed by protruding the lips a little more than in o, forming a ſmaller aperture with them, and inſtead of ſwelling the voice in the middle of the mouth, bringing it as forward as poſſible to the lips.

40. Y final in try, is formed like i: and w final in now, like the oo, which has juſt been deſcribed.

In this view of the organic formation of the vowels we find that a, e, and o, are the only ſimple or pure vowels: that i is a diphthong, and that u is a ſemi-conſonant. If we were inclined to contrive a ſcale for meaſuring the breadth or narrowneſs, or as others term it, the openneſs or cloſeneſs of the vowels, we might begin with e open, as Mr. Elphinſton calls it, and which he announces to be the cloſeſt of all the vocal powers. In the pronunciation of this letter we find the aperture of the mouth extended on each ſide; the lips almoſt cloſed, and the ſound iſſuing horizontally. The ſlender a in waſte, opens the mouth a little wider. The a in father, opens the mouth ſtill more without contracting the corners. The German a heard in wall, not only opens the mouth wider than the former a, but contracts the corners of the mouth ſo as to make the aperture approach nearer to a circle, while the o opens the mouth ſtill more, and contracts the corners ſo as to make it the os rotundum, a picture of the letter it ſounds. If therefore the other vowels were, like o, to take their forms from the aperture of the mouth in pronouncing them, the German a ought neceſſarily to have a figure as nearly approaching the o in form as it does in ſound; that is, it ought to have that elliptical form which approaches neareſt to the circle; as the a of the Italians, and that of the Engliſh in father, ought to form ovals, in exact proportion to the breadth of their ſounds; the Engliſh a in waſte ought to have a narrower oval; the e in the ought to have the curve of a parabola, and the ſqueezed ſound of ee in ſeen a right line; or to reduce theſe lines to ſolids, the o would be a perfect globe, the German a an oblate ſpheroid like the figure of the earth, the Italian like an egg, the Engliſh ſlender a a Dutch ſkittle, the e a rolling pin, and the double e a cylinder Organic Formation of the Conſonants.

41. The beſt method of ſhewing the organic formation of the conſonants will be to claſs them into ſuch pairs as they naturally fall into, and then by deſcribing one, we ſhall nearly deſcribe its fellow; by which means the labour will be leſſened, and the nature of the conſonants better perceived. The conſonants that fall into pairs are the following:

p	f	t	s	ſh	th	k	ch	chair
b	v	d	z	zh	dh	g	j	jail

42. Holder, who wrote the moſt elaborately and philoſophically upon this ſubject, tells us, in his Elements of Speech, that when we only whiſper we cannot diſtinguiſh the firſt rank of theſe letters from the ſecond. It is certain the difference between them is very nice; the upper letters ſeeming to have only a ſmarter, briſker appulſe of the organs than the latter; which may not improperly be diſtinguiſhed by ſharp and flat. The moſt marking diſtinction between them will be found to be a ſort of guttural murmur, which precedes the latter letters when we wiſh to pronounce them forcibly, but not the former. Thus if we cloſe the lips, and put the fingers on them to keep them ſhut, and ſtrive to pronounce the p, no ſound at all will be heard; but in ſtriving to pronounce the b we ſhall find a murmuring ſound from the throat, which ſeems the commencement of the letter; and if we do but ſtop the breath by the appulſe of the organs, in order to pronounce with greater force, the ſame may be obſerved of the reſt of the letters.

43. This difference in the formation of theſe conſonants may be more diſtinctly perceived in the s and z than in any other of the letters; the former is ſounded by the ſimple iſſue of the breath between the teeth, without any vibration of it in the throat, and may be called a hiſſing ſound: while the latter cannot be formed without generating a ſound in the throat, which may be called a vocal ſound. The upper rank of letters, therefore, may be called breathing conſonants; and the lower, vocal ones.

44. Theſe obſervations premiſed, we may proceed to deſcribe the organic formation of each letter.

45. P and B are formed by cloſing the lips till the breath is collected, and then letting it iſſue by forming the vowel e.

46. F and V are formed by preſſing the upper teeth upon the under lip, and ſounding the vowel e before the former and after the latter of theſe letters.

47. T and D are formed by preſſing the tip of the tongue to the gums of the upper teeth, and then ſeparating them, by pronouncing the vowel e.

48. S and Z are formed by placing the tongue in the ſame poſition as in T and D, but not ſo cloſe to the gums as to ſtop the breath: a ſpace is left between the tongue and the palate for the breath to iſſue, which forms the hiſſing and buzzing ſound of theſe letters.

49. SH heard in miſſion, and zh in evaſion, are formed in the ſame ſeat of ſound as s and z; but in the former, the tongue is drawn a little inwards, and at a ſomewhat greater diſtance from the palate, which occaſions a fuller effuſion of breath from the hollow of the mouth, than in the latter; which are formed nearer to the teeth.

50. TH in think, and the ſame letters in that, are formed by protruding the tongue between the fore teeth, preſſing it againſt the upper teeth, and at the ſame time endeavouring to ſound the s or z; the fomer letter to ſound th in think, and the latter to ſound th in that.

51. K and G hard are formed by preſſing the middle of the tongue to the roof of the mouth near the throat, and ſeparating them a little ſmartly to form the firſt, and more gently to form the laſt of theſe letters.

52. CH in chair, and J in jail, are formed by preſſing t to ſh, and d to zh.

53. M is formed by cloſing the lips, as in P and B, and letting the voice iſſue by the noſe.

54. N is formed by reſting the tongue in the ſame poſition as in T or D, and breathing through the noſe, with the mouth open.

55. L is formed by nearly the ſame poſition of the organs as t and d, but more with the tip of the tongue, which is brought a little forwarder to the teeth, while the breath iſſues from the mouth.

56. R is formed by placing the tongue nearly in the poſition of t, but at ſuch a diſtance from the palate as ſuffers it to jarr againſt it, when the breath is propelled from the throat to the mouth.

57. NG in ring, ſing, &c. is formed in the ſame ſeat of ſound as hard g; but while the middle of the tongue preſſes the roof of the mouth, as in G, the voice paſſes principally through the noſe, as in N.

58. Y conſonant is formed by placing the organs in the poſition of e, and ſqueezing the tongue againſt the roof of the mouth, which produces ee, which is equivalent to initial y. (36).

59. W conſonant is formed by placing the organs in the poſition of oo, deſcribed under u, and cloſing the lips a little more, in order to propel the breath upon the ſucceeding vowel which it articulates.

60. In this ſketch of the formation and diſtribution of the conſonants, it is curious to obſerve on how few radical principles the almoſt infinite variety of combination in language depends. It is with ſome degree of wonder we perceive that the ſlighteſt aſpiration, the almoſt inſenſible inflection of nearly ſimilar ſounds, often generate the moſt different and oppoſite meanings. In this view of nature, as in every other, we find uniformity and variety very conſpicuous. The ſingle fiat, at firſt impreſſed on the chaos, ſeems to operate on languages; which, from the ſimplicity and paucity of their principles, and the extent and power of their combinations, prove the goodneſs, wiſdom, and omnipotence, of their origin.

61. This analogical aſſociation of ſounds is not only curious, but uſeful: it gives us a comprehenſive view of the powers of the letters; and from the ſmall number that are radically different, enables us to ſee the rules on which their varieties depend. It diſcovers to us the genius and propenſities of ſeveral lauguages and dialects, and, when authority is ſilent, enables us to decide agreeably to analogy.

62. The vowels, diphthongs, and conſonants, thus enumerated and defined, before we proceed to aſcertain their different powers as they are differently aſſociated with each other, it may be neceſſary to give ſome account of thoſe diſtinctions of ſound in the ſame vowels which expreſs their quantity as long or ſhort, or their quality as open or cloſe, or ſlender and broad. This will appear the more neceſſary as theſe diſtinctions ſo frequently occur in deſcribing the ſounds of the vowels, and as they are not unfrequently uſed with too little preciſion by moſt writers on the ſubject.

Of the Quantity and Quality of the Vowels.

63. The firſt diſtinction of ſound that ſeems to obtrude itſelf upon us when we utter the vowels, is a long and a ſhort ſound according to the greater or leſs duration of time taken up in pronouncing them. This diſtinction is ſo obvious as to have been adopted in all languages, and is that to which we annex clearer ideas than to any other: and though the ſhort ſounds of ſome vowels have not in our language been claſſed with ſufficient accuracy with their parent long ones; yet this had bred but little confuſion, as vowels long and ſhort are always ſufficiently diſtinguiſhable; and the nice appropriation of ſhort ſounds to their ſpecific long ones, is not neceſſary to our conveying what ſound we mean, when the letter to which we apply theſe ſounds is known, and its power agreed upon.

64. The next diſtinction of vowels into their ſpecific ſounds, which ſeems to be he moſt generally adopted, is that which ariſes from the different apertures of the mouth in forming them. It is certainly very natural, when we have ſo many more ſimple ſounds than we have characters by which to expreſs them, to diſtinguiſh them by that which ſeems their organic definition; and we accordingly find vowels denominated by the French, ouvert and fermé; by the Italians, aperto and chiuſo; and by the Engliſh, open and ſhut.

65. But whatever propriety there may be in the uſe of theſe terms in other languages, it is certain they muſt be uſed with caution in Engliſh for fear of confounding them with long and ſhort. Dr. Johnſon and other grammarians call the a in father the open a: which may, indeed, diſtinguiſh it from the ſlender a in paper; but not from the broad a in water, which is ſtill more open. Each of theſe letters has a ſhort ſound, which may be called a ſhut ſound; but the long ſounds cannot be ſo properly denominated open as more or leſs broad: that is, the a in paper, the ſlender ſound; the a in father, the broadiſh or middle ſound; and the a in water, the broad ſound. The ſame may be obſerved of the o. This letter has three long ſounds, heard in move, note, nor; which graduate from ſlender to broadiſh, and broad like the a. The i alſo in mine may be called the broad i, and that in machine the ſlender i; though each of them are equally long; and though theſe vowels that are long may be ſaid to be more or leſs open according to the different apertures of the mouth in forming them; yet the ſhort vowels cannot be ſaid to be more or leſs ſhut. For as ſhort always implies ſhut (except in verſe), though long does not always imply open, we muſt be careful not to confound long and open, and cloſe and ſhut, when we ſpeak of the quantity and quality of the vowels. The truth of it is; all vowels, either terminate a ſyllable, or are united with a conſonant. In the firſt caſe, if the accent be on the ſyllable, the vowel is long, though it may not be open: in the ſecond caſe, where a vowel is terminated by a conſonant, except that conſonant be r, whether the accent be on the ſyllable or not, the vowel has its ſhort ſound, which, compared with its long one, may be called ſhut. But as no vowel can be ſaid to be ſhut that is not joined to a conſonant, all vowels that end ſyllables may be ſaid to be open whether the accent be on them or not. (550) (551).

66. But though the terms long and ſhort, as applied to vowels, are pretty generally underſtood, an accurate ear will eaſily perceive that theſe terms do not always mean the long and ſhort ſounds of the reſpective vowels to which they are applied: for if we chooſe to be directed by the ear in denominating vowels, long or ſhort, we muſt certainly give theſe appellations to thoſe ſounds only which have exactly the ſame radical tone, and differ only in the long or ſhort emiſſion of that tone. Thus meaſuring the ſounds of the vowels by this ſcale, we ſhall find that the long I and y have properly no ſhort ſounds but ſuch as ſeem eſſentially diſtinct from their long ones; and that the ſhort ſound of theſe vowels is no other than the ſhort ſound of e, which is the latter letter in the compoſition of theſe diphthongs.

67. The ſame want of correſpondence in claſſing the long and ſhort vowls we find in a, e, o, and u; for as the e in theme does not find its ſhort ſound in the ſame letter in them, but in the i in him; ſo the e in them muſt deſcend a ſtep lower into the province of a for its long ſound in tame. The a in carry is not the ſhort ſound of the a in care, but of that in car, father, &c. as the ſhort broad ſound of the a in want is the true abbreviation of that in wall. The ſound of o in don, gone, &c. is exactly correſpondent to the a in ſwan, and finds its long ſound in the a in wall, or the diphthong aw in dawn, lawn, &c.; while the ſhort ſound of the o in tone is nearly that of the ſame letter in ton, (a weight,) and correſponding with what is generally called the ſhort ſound of u in tun, gun, &c. as the long ſound of u in pule muſt find its ſhort ſound in the u in pull, bull. &c.; for this vowel, like the i and y, being a diphthong, its ſhort ſound is formed from the latter part of the letter equivalent to double o; as this word, if ſpelled according to the ſound, might be written peoole.

68. Another obſervation preparatory to a conſideration of the various ſounds of the vowels and conſonants ſeems to be the influence of the accent: as the accent or ſtreſs which is laid upon certain ſyllables has ſo obvious an effect upon the ſounds of the letters, that unleſs we take accent into the account, it will be impoſſible to reaſon rightly upon the proper pronunciation of the Elements of Speech.

69. It may be firſt obſerved, that the exertion of the organs of ſpeech neceſſary to produce the accent or ſtreſs, has an obvious tendency to preſerve the letters in their pure and uniform ſound, while the relaxation or feebleneſs which ſucceeds the accent as naturally ſuffers the letters to ſlide into a ſomewhat different ſound a little eaſier to the organs of pronunciation. Thus the firſt a in cabbage is pronounced diſtinctly with the true ſound of that letter, while the ſecond a goes into an obſcure ſound bordering on the i ſhort; the ſlendereſt of all ſounds; ſo that cabbage and village have the a in the laſt ſyllable ſcarcely diſtinguiſhable from the e and i in the laſt ſyllables of college and veſtige.

70. In the ſame manner the a, e, i, o, and y, coming before r in a final unaccented ſyllable, go into an obſcure ſound ſo nearly approaching to the ſhort u, that if the accent were carefully kept upon the firſt ſyllables of liar, lier, elixir, mayor, martyr, &c. theſe words, without any perceptible change in the ſound of their laſt ſyllables, might all be written and pronounced, liur, liur, elixur, mayur, martur, &c.

71. The conſonants alſo are no leſs altered in their ſound by the poſition of the accent than the vowels. The k and s in the compoſition of x, when the accent is on them, in exerciſe, execute, &c. preſerve their ſtrong pure ſound; but when the accent is on the ſecond ſyllable, in exact, exonerate, &c. theſe letters ſlide into the duller and weaker ſounds of g and z, which are eaſier to the organs of pronunciation. Hence not only the ſoft c and the s go into sh, but even the t before a diphthong ſlides into the ſame letters when the ſtreſs is on the preceding ſyllable. Thus in ſociety and ſatiety the c and t preſerve their pure ſound, becauſe the ſyllables ci and ti have the accent on them; but in ſocial and ſatiate theſe ſyllables come after the ſtreſs, and from the feebleneſs of their ſituation naturally fall into the ſhorter and eaſier ſound, as if written ſoſhial and ſaſhiate. See the word Satiety.

72. A has three long ſounds and two ſhort ones.

73. The firſt ſound of the firſt letter in our alphabet is that which among the Engliſh is its name. This is what is called by moſt grammarians its ſlender ſound (35); we find it in the words lade, ſpade, trade, &c. In the diphthong ai, we have exactly the ſame ſound of this letter, as in pain, gain, ſtain, &c. and ſometimes in the diphthong ea, as bear, ſwear, pear, &c. nay, twice we find it, contrary to every rule of pronunciation, in the words where and there, and once in the anomalous diphthong ao in gaol. It exactly correſponds to the ſound of the French e in the beginning of the words être and tête.

74. The long ſlender a is generally produced by a ſilent e at the end of the ſyllable; which e not only keeps one ſingle intervening conſonant from ſhortening the preceding vowel, but ſometimes two: thus we find the mute e makes of rag, rage, and keeps the a open even in range, change, &c. hat, with the mute e becomes hate, and the a continues open, and, perhaps, ſomewhat longer in haſte, waſte, paſte, &c. though it muſt be confeſſed this ſeems the privilege only of a; for the other vowels contract before the conſonants ng in revenge, cringe, plunge; and the ſte in our language is preceded by no other vowel but this. Every conſonant but n ſhortens every vowel but a, when ſoft g and e ſilent ſucceed; as bilge, badge, hinge, ſpunge, &c.

75. Hence we may eſtabliſh this general rule: A has the long, open, ſlender ſound, when followed by a ſingle conſonant, and e mute, as lade, made, fade, &c. The only exceptions ſeem to be, have, are, gape, and bade, the paſt time of to bid.

76. A has the ſame ſound, when ending an accented ſyllable, as pa-per, ta-per, ſpec-ta-tor. The only exceptions are, fa-ther, ma-ſter, wa-ter.

77. As the ſhort ſound of the long ſlender a is not found under the ſame character, but in the ſhort e (as may be perceived by comparing mate and met) we proceed to delineate the ſecond ſound of this vowel, which is that heard in father, and is called by ſome the open ſound (34); but this can never diſtinguiſh it from the deeper ſound of the a in all, ball, &c. which is ſtill more open: by ſome it is ſtyled the middle ſound of a, as between the a in pale, and that in wall. It anſwers nearly to the Italian a in Toſcano, Romana, &c. or to the final a in the naturalized Greek words, papa and mamma; and in baa; the word adopted in almoſt all languages to expreſs the cry of ſheep. We ſeldom find the long ſound of this letter in our language, except in monoſyllables ending with r, as far, tar, mar, &c. and in the word father. There are certain words from the Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh languages, ſuch as lumbago, bravado, tornado, &c. which are ſometimes heard will this ſound of a; but except in bravo, heard chiefly at the Theatres, the Engliſh ſound of a is preferable in all theſe words.

78. The long ſound of the middle or Italian a is always found before r in monoſyllables, as car, far, mar, &c. before the liquids lm; whether the latter only be pronounced as in pſalm, or both, as in pſalmiſt; ſometimes before lf, and lve, as calf, half, calve, halve, ſalve, &c. and laſtly before the ſharp aſpirated dental th in bath, path, lath, &c. and in the word father: this ſound of the a was formerly more than at preſent found before the naſal liquid n, eſpecially when ſucceeded by t or c, as grant, dance, glance, lance, France, chance, prance, ſlant, ſlander, &c.

79. The hiſſing conſonant s was likewſe a ſign of this ſound of the a, whether doubled, as in glaſs, graſs, &c. or accompanied by t, as in laſt, faſt, &c. but this pronunciation of a ſeems to have been for ſome years advancing to the ſhort ſound of this letter, as heard in hand, land, grand, &c. and pronouncing the a in after, anſwer, baſket, plant, maſt, &c. as long as in half, calf, &c. borders very cloſely on vulgarity: it muſt be obſerved, however, that the a before n in monoſyllables, and at the end of words, was anciently written with u after it, and ſo probably pronounced as broad as the German a. For Dr. Johnſon obſerves, "many words pronounced with a broad, "were anciently written with au, as fault, mault; and "we ſtill write fault, vault. This was probably the "Saxon ſound, for it is yet retained in the northern dia-"lects, and in the ruſtic pronunciation, as maun for man, "haund for hand." But ſince the u has vaniſhed, the a has been gradually pronounced ſlenderer and ſhorter, till now almoſt every veſtige of the ancient orthography ſeems loſt; though the termination mand in command, demand, &c. formerly written commaund, demaund, ſtill retains the long ſound inviolably *.

* Since the firſt publication of this Dictionary the Public have been favoured with ſome very elaborate and judicious obſerva-

80. As the mute l in calm, pſalm, calf, half, &c. ſeems to lengthen the ſound of this letter, ſo the abbreviation of ſome words by apoſtrophe ſeems to have the ſame effect. Thus when, by impatience, that grand corrupter of manners, as well as language, the no is cut out of the word cannot, and the two ſyllables reduced to one, we find the a lengthened to the Italian or middle a, as cannot, can't; have not, han't; ſhall not, ſha'n't, &c. This is no more than what the Latin language is ſubject to; it being a known rule in that tongue, that when, by compoſition or otherwiſe, two ſhort ſyllables become one, that ſyllable is almoſt always long, as alius has the penultimate long becauſe it comes from alijus, and the two vowels in the laſt of Orpheus make one long ſyllable, as formed of Orpheüs, where they make two ſhort ones.

81. The ſhort ſound of the middle or Italian a, which is generally confounded with the ſhort ſound of the ſlender a, is the ſound of this vowel in man, pan, tan, mat, hat, &c. we generally find this ſound before any two ſucceſſive conſonants but thoſe excepted in the foregoing remarks, even when it comes before an r, if a vowel follow, or the r be doubled; for if this conſonant be doubled, in order to produce another ſyllable, the long ſound becomes ſhort, as mar, marry; tar, tarry; car, carry, &c. where we find the monoſyllables has the long, and the diſſyllable the ſhort ſound; but if a come before r, followed by another conſonant, it has its long ſound, as in part, partial, &c.

82. The only exception to this rule is, in adjectives derived from ſubſtantives ending in r: for in this caſe the a continues long, as in the primitive. Thus the a in ſtarry, or full of ſtars, is as long as in ſtar; and the a in the adjective tarry, or beſmeared with tar, is as long as in the ſubſtantive tar, though ſhort in the word tarry, (to ſtay).

83. The third long ſound of a is that which we more immediately derive from our maternal language the Saxon; but which at preſent we uſe leſs than any other: this is the a in fall, ball, gall (33): we find a correſpondent ſound to this a in the diphthongs au and aw; as laud, law, ſaw, &c. though it muſt here be noted, that we have improved upon our German parent, by giving a broader ſound to this letter in theſe words than the Germans themſelves would do, were they to pronounce them.

84. The long ſound of the deep broad German a is produced by ll after it, as in all, wall, call; or indeed by one l, and any other conſonant except the mute labials p, b, f, and v, and the ſharp and flat gutturlas c or k and g; as ſalt, bald, falſe, &c. The exceptions to this rule are generally words from the Arabic and Latin languages; as Alps, Albion, aſphaltic, ſalve, calculate, amalgamate, Alcoran, and Alfred, &c.; the two laſt of which may be conſidered as ancient proper names which have been frequently latinized, and by this means have acquired a ſlenderer ſound of a. This rule, however, muſt be underſtood of ſuch ſyllables only as have the accent on them; for when al, followed by a conſonant, is in the firſt ſyllable of a word, having the accent on the ſecond, it is then pronounced as in the firſt ſyllables of al-ley, val-ley, &c. as alternate, &c. Our modern orthography, which has done its utmoſt to perplex pronunciation, has made it neceſſary to obſerve, that every word compounded of a monoſyllable with ll, as albeit, alſo, almoſt, downfal, &c. muſt be pronounced as if the two liquids were ſtill remaining, notwithſtanding our word-menders have wiſely taken one away, to the deſtruction both of ſound and etymology; for, as Mr. Elphinſton ſhrewdly obſerves, "Every reader, young and old, muſt "now be ſo ſagacious an analyſt as to diſcern at once not "only what are compounds and what their ſimples, but "that al in compoſition is equal to all out of it; or in "other words, that it is both what it is, and what it is "not," Prin. Eng. Language, vol. I. page 60. See No. 404.

85. The w has a peculiar quality of broadening this letter, even when prepoſitive: this is always the effect, except when the vowel is cloſed by the ſharp or flat guttural k or g, x, ng, nk, or the ſharp labial f, as wax, waft, thwack, twang: thus we pronounce the a broad, though ſhort, in wad, wan, want, was, what, &c. and though other letters ſuffer the a to alter its ſound before ll, when one of theſe letters goes to the formation of the latter ſyllable, as tall, tal-low; hall, hal-low; call, cal-low, &c. yet we ſee w preſerve the ſound of this vowel before a ſingle conſonant, as wal-low, ſwal-low, &c.

86. The q including the ſound of the w, and being no more than this letter preceded by k, ought, according to analogy, to broaden every a it goes before like the w; thus quantity ought to be pronounced as if written kwontity, and quality ſhould rhyme with jollity; inſtead of which we frequently hear the w robbed of its rights in its proxy; and quality ſo pronounced as to rhyme with legality: while to rhyme quantity, according to this affected mode of pronouncing it, we muſt coin ſuch words as plantity and conſonantity. The a in Quaver and Equator is an exception tions on Engliſh pronunciation by Mr. Smith, in a Scheme of a French and Engliſh Dictionary. In this work he departs frequently from my judgment, and particularly in the pronunciation of the letter a, when ſucceeded by ſs, ſt, or n, and another conſonant; as paſs, laſt, chance, &c. to which he annexes the long ſound of a in father. That this was the ſound formerly, is highly probable from its being ſtill the ſound given it by the vulgar, who are generally the laſt to alter the common pronunciation; but that the ſhort a in theſe words is now the general pronunciation of the polite and learned world, ſeems to be candidly acknowledged by Mr. Smith himſelf: and as every correct ear would be diſguſted at giving the a in theſe words the full long ſound of the a in father, any middle ſound ought to be diſcountenanced, as tending to render the pronunciation of a language obſcure and indefinite. (163).

Ben Jonſon in his Grammar claſſes ſalt, malt, balm, and calm, as having the ſame ſound of a; and aunt, as having the ſame diphthongal ſound as audience, author, law, ſaw, draw, &c.

to this rule, from the preponderancy of another which requires a, ending a ſyllable under the accent, to have the ſlender ſound of that letter; to which rule, father, maſter, and water, are the only exceptions.

87. The ſhort ſound of this broad a is heard when it is preceded by w, and ſucceeded by a ſingle conſonant in the ſame ſyllable, as wal-low, ſwal-low, &c. or by two conſonants in the ſame ſyllable, as want, waſt, waſp, &c.; but when l or r is one of the conſonants, the a becomes long, as walk, ſwarm, &c.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

88. But beſides the long and ſhort ſounds common to all the vowels, there is a certain tranſient indiſtinct pronunciation of ſome of them, when they are not accented, that cannot be ſo eaſily ſettled: when the accent is not upon it, no vowel is more apt to run into this imperfect ſound than the a; thus the particle a before participles, in the phraſes a-going, a-walking, a-ſhooting, &c. ſeems, ſays Dr. Lowth, to be the true and genuine prepoſition on, a little diſguiſed by familiar uſe and quick pronunciation: the ſame indiſtinctneſs, from rapidity and coincidence of ſound, has confounded the pronunciation of this mutilated prepoſition to the ear, in the different queſtions what's o'clock, when we would know the hour, and what's a clock, when we would have the deſcription of that horary machine; and if the accent be kept ſtrongly on the firſt ſyllable of the word tolerable, as it always ought to be, we find ſcarcely any diſtinguiſhable difference to the ear, if we ſubſtitute u or o inſtead of a in the penultimate ſyllable. Thus tolerable, toleroble, and toleruble, are exactly the ſame word to the ear, if pronounced without premeditation or tranſpoſing the accent, for the real purpoſe of diſtinction; and inwards, outwards, &c. might, with reſpect to ſound, be ſpelt inwurds, outwurds, &c.. Thus the word man, when not under the accent, might be written mun in nobleman, huſbandman, woman, &c. The ſame obſervation will hold good in almoſt every final ſyllable where a is not accented; as medal, dial, giant, bias, &c. defiance, temperance, &c. (92)

89. There is a corrupt, but a received, pronunciation of this letter in the words any, many, Thames, where the a ſounds like ſhort e, as if written enny, menny, Tems. Catch, among Londoners, ſeems to have degenerated into Ketch.

90. The a goes into a ſound approaching the ſhort i, in the numerous termination in age, when the accent is not on it, as cabbage, village, courage, &c. and are pronounced nearly as if written cabbige, villige, courige, &c.

91. The a in the numerous termination ate, when the accent is not on it, is pronounced ſomewhat differently in different words. If the word be a ſubſtantive, or an adjective, the a ſeems to be ſhorter than when it is a verb: thus a good ear will diſcover a difference in the quantity of this letter, in delicate and dedicate, in climate, primate, and ultimate; and calculate, regulate, and ſpeculate, where we find the nouns and adjectives have the a conſiderably ſhorter than the verbs. Innate, however, preſerves the a as long as if the accent were on it. But the unaccented terminations in ate, whether nouns or verbs, have the a ſo ſhort and obſcure as to be nearly ſimilar to the u in us; thus palace, ſolace, menace, pinnace, populace, might, without any great departure from their common ſound, be written pallus, ſollus, &c. while furnace almoſt changes the a into i, and might be written furniſs.

92. When the a is preceded by the gutturals, hard g or c, it is, in polite pronunciation, ſoftened by the intervention of a ſound like e, ſo that card, cart, guard, regard, are pronounced like ke-ard, ke-art, ghe-ard, re-ghe-ard. When the a is pronounced ſhort, as in the firſt ſyllables of cabbage, gander, &c. the interpoſition of the e is very perceptible, and indeed unavoidable: for though we can pronounce guard and cart without interpoſing the e, it is impoſſible to pronounce garriſon and carriage in the ſame manner. This ſound of the a is taken notice of in Steele's Grammar, page 49, which proves it is not the offſpring of the preſent day (160); and I have the ſatisfaction to find Mr. Smith, a very accurate inquirer into the ſubject, entirely of my opinion. But the ſound of the a, which I have found the moſt difficult to appreciate, is that where it ends the ſyllable, either immediately before or after the accent. We cannot give it any of its three open ſounds without hurting the ear. Thus in pronouncing the words abound and diadem, ay-bound, ah-bound, and aw-bound; di-ay-dem, di-ah-dem, and di-aw-dem, are all improper; but giving the a the ſecond or Italian ſound, as ah-bound and di-ah-dem, ſeems the leaſt ſo. For which reaſon I have, like Mr. Sheridan, adopted the ſhort ſound of this letter to mark this unaccented a. But if the unaccented a be final, which is not the caſe in any word purely Engliſh, it then ſeems to approach ſtill nearer to the Italian a in the laſt ſyllable of papa, and to the a in father; as may be heard in the deliberate pronunciation of the words idea, Africa, Delta, &c. (88).

93. The firſt ſound of e is that which it has when lengthened by the mute e final, as in glebe, theme, &c. or ending a ſyllable, as ſe-cre-tion, ad-he-ſion, &c. (36).

94. The exceptions to this rule are, the words where and there: in which the firſt e is pronounced like a, as if written whare, thare, and the auxiliary verb were: where the e has its ſhort ſound, as if written werr, rhyming with the laſt ſyllable of pre-fer. Ere (before) ſounds like air.

95. The ſhort ſound of e is that heard in bed, fed, red, wed, &c.; this ſound before r is apt to ſlide into ſhort u; and we ſometimes hear mercy ſounded as if written murcy; but this, though very near, is not the exact ſound.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

96. The e at the end of the monoſyllables be, he, me, we, is pronounced ee; as if written bee, hee, &c. It is ſilent at the end of words purely Engliſh, but is pronounced diſtinctly at the end of ſome words from the learned languages, as epitome, ſimile, &c.

97. The firſt e in the poetic contractions, e'er and ne'er, is pronounced like a; as if written air and nair.

98. The e in her is pronounced nearly like ſhort u; and as we hear it in the unaccented terminations of writer, reader, &c. pronounced as if written writur, readur, where we may obſerve that the r being only a jar, and not a definite and diſtinct articulation like the other conſonants, inſtead of ſtopping the vocal efflux of voice, lets it imperfectly paſs, and ſo corrupts and alters the true ſound of the vowel. The ſame may be obſerved of the final e after r in words ending in cre, gre, tre, where the e is ſounded as if it were placed before the r as in lucre, maugre, theatre, &c. pronounced lukur, maugur, theatur, &c. See No. 418. It may be remarked, that though we ought cautiouſly to avoid pronouncing the e like u when under the accent, it would be nimis Atticè, and border too much on affectation of accuracy to preſerve this ſound of e in unaccented ſyllables before r; and though terrible ſhould never be pronounced as if written turrible, it is impoſſible without pedantry to make any difference in the ſound of the laſt ſyllables of ſplendour and tender; ſulphur and ſuffer; or martyr and garter. But there is a ſmall deviation from rule when this letter begins a word, and is followed by a double conſonant with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable: in this caſe we find the vowel lengthen as if the conſonant were ſingle. See EFFACE, DESPATCH, EMBALM.

99. This vowel, in a final unaccented ſyllable, is apt to ſlide into the ſhort i: thus faces, ranges, praiſes, are pronounced as if written faciz, rangiz, praiziz; poet, covet, linen, &c. as if written poit, covit, linin, &c. Where we may obſerve, that though the e goes into the ſhort ſound of i, it is exactly that ſound which correſponds to the long ſound of e. See Port Royal Grammaire, Latin, page 142.

100. There is a remarkable exception to the common ſound of this letter in the words clerk, ſerjeant, and a few others, where we find the e pronounced like the a in dark and margin. But this exception, I imagine, was, till within theſe few years, the general rule of ſounding this letter before r, followed by another conſonant. See MERCHANT. Thirty years ago every one pronounced the firſt ſyllable of merchant like the monoſyllable march, and as it was anciently written marchant. Service and ſervant are ſtill heard among the lower order of ſpeakers, as if written ſarvice and ſarvant; and even among the better ſort, we ſometimes hear the ſalutation, Sir, your ſarvant; though this pronunciation of the word ſingly would be looked upon as a mark of the loweſt vulgarity. The proper names, Derby and Berkeley, ſtill retain the old ſound, as if written Darby and Barkeley; but even theſe, in polite uſage, are getting into the common ſound, nearly as if written Durby and Burkeley. As this modern pronunciation of the e has a tendency to ſimplify the language by leſſening the number of exceptions, it ought certainly to be indulged.

101. This letter falls into an irregular ſound, but ſtill a ſound which is its neareſt relation, in the words, England, yes, and pretty, where the e is heard like ſhort i. Vulgar ſpeakers are guilty of the ſame irregularity in engine, as if written ingine; but this cannot be too carefully avoided.

102. The vowel e before l and n in the final unaccented ſyllable, by its being ſometimes ſuppreſſed and ſometimes not, forms one of the moſt puzzling difficulties in pronunciation. When any of the liquids precede theſe letters, the e is heard diſtinctly, as woollen, flannel, women, ſyren; but when any of the other conſonants come before theſe letters, the e is ſometimes heard, as in novel, ſudden; and ſometimes not, as in ſwivel, raven, &c. As no other rule can be given for this variety of pronunciation, perhaps the beſt way will be to draw the line between thoſe words where e is pronounced, and thoſe where it is not; and this, by the help of the Rhyming Dictionary, I am luckily enabled to do. In the firſt place, then, it may be obſerved, the e before l, in a final unaccented ſyllable, muſt always be pronounced diſtinctly, except in the following words: ſhekel, weaſel, ouſel, nouſel, (better written nuzzle), navel, ravel, ſnivel, rivel, drivel, ſhrivel, ſhovel, grovel, hazel, drazel, nozel. Theſe words are pronounced as if that e were omitted by an apoſtrophe, as ſhek'l, weas'l, ous'l, &c. or rather as if written ſheckle, weazle, ouzle, &c.; but as theſe are the only words of this termination that are ſo pronounced, great care muſt be taken that we do not pronounce travel, gravel, rebel (the ſubſtantive), parcel, chapel, and veſſel, in the ſame manner; a fault to which many are very prone.

103. E before n in a final unaccented ſyllable, and not preceded by a liquid, muſt always be ſuppreſſed, except in the following words: ſudden, mynchen, kitchen, hyphen, chicken, ticken, (better written ticking), jerken, aſpen, platen, paten, marten, latten, patten, leaven, or leven, ſloven, mittens. In theſe words the e is heard diſtinctly, contrary to the general rule which ſuppreſſes the e in theſe ſyllables, when preceded by a mute, as harden, heathen, heaven, as if written hard'n, heathe'n, heav'n, &c. nay, even when preceded by a liquid in the words fallen, and ſtolen, where the e is ſuppreſſed, as if they were written fall'n, and ſtoll'n: garden and burden, therefore, are very analogically pronounced gard'n and burd'n; and this pronunciation ought the rather to be indulged, as we always hear the e ſuppreſſed in gardener and burdenſome, as if written gard'ner and burd'nſome.

104. This diverſity in the pronunciation of theſe terminations ought the more carefully to be attended to, as nothing is ſo vulgar and childiſh as to hear ſwivel and heaven pronounced with the e diſtinctly, or novel and chicken with the e ſuppreſſed. But the moſt general ſuppreſſion of this letter is in the participial termination ed: here, where the e is not preceded by d or t, the e is almoſt univerſally ſunk (362), and the two final conſonants are pronounced in one ſyllable: thus loved, lived, barred, marred, are pronounced as if written lovd, livd, bard, mard. The ſame may be obſerved of this letter when ſilent in the ſingulars of nouns, or the firſt perſons of verbs, as theme, make, &c. which form themes, makes, &c. where the laſt e is ſilent, and the words are pronounced in one ſyllable. When the noun or firſt perſon of the verb ends in y, with the accent on it, the e is likewiſe ſuppreſſed, as a reply, two replies, he replies, &c. When words of this form have the accent on the preceding ſyllables, the e is ſuppreſſed, and the y pronounced like ſhort i, as cherries, marries, carries, &c. pronounced cherriz, marriz, carriz, &c. In the ſame manner, carried, married, imbodied, &c. are pronounced as if written carrid, marrid, imbodid, &c. But it muſt be carefully noted, that there is a remarkable exception to many of theſe contractions when we are pronouncing the language of Scripture: here every participial ed ought to make a diſtinct ſyllable, where it is not preceded by a vowel. Thus, "Who hath believed "our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord re-"vealed?" Here the participles are both pronounced in three ſyllables; but in the following paſſage, "Whom he "did predeſtinate, them he alſo called; and whom he "called, them he alſo juſtified; and whom he juſtified, "them he alſo glorified." Called preſerves the e, and is pronounced in two ſyllables; and juſtified and glorified ſuppreſs the e, and are pronounced in three.

I.

105. This letter is a perfect diphthong, compoſed of the ſound of a in father, and e in he, pronounced as cloſely together as poſſible (57). When theſe ſounds are openly pronounced, they produce the familiar aſſent ay; which, by the old Engliſh dramatic writers, was often expreſſed by I. This ſound is heard when the letter is lengthened by final e, as time, thine, or ending a ſyllable with the accent upon it, as ti-tle, di-al; in monoſyllables ending with nd, as bind, find, mind, &c.; in three words ending with ld, as child, mild, wild; and in one very irregularly ending with nt, as pint. (37).

106. There is one inſtance where this letter, though ſucceeded by final e, does not go into the broad Engliſh ſound like the noun eye, but into the ſlender foreign ſound like e. This is in the word ſhire, pronounced as if written ſheer, both when ſingle, as a knight of the ſhire; or in compoſition, as in Nottinghamſhire, Leiceſterſhire, &c. This is the ſound Dr. Lowth gives it in his Grammar, page 4: and it is highly probable that the ſimple ſhire acquired this ſlender ſound from its tendency to become ſlender in the compounds, where it is at a diſtance from the accent, and where all the vowels have a natural tendency to become ſhort and obſcure. See SHIRE.

107. The ſhort ſound of this letter is heard in him, thin, &c. and when ending an unaccented ſyllable, as van-i-ty, qual-i-ty, &c. where, though it cannot be properly ſaid to be ſhort, as it is not cloſed by a conſonant, yet it has but half its diphthongal ſound. This ſound is the ſound of e, the laſt letter of the diphthong that forms the long I; and it is not a little ſurpriſing that Dr. Johnſon ſhould ſay that the ſhort i was a ſound wholly different from the long one. (551).

108. When this letter is ſucceeded by r, and another conſonant not in a final ſyllable, it has exactly the ſound of e in vermin, vernal, &c. as virtue, virgin, &c. which approaches to the ſound of ſhort u; but when it comes before r, followed by another conſonant in a final ſyllable, it acquires the ſound of u exactly; as bird, dirt, ſhirt, ſquirt, &c. Mirth, birth, gird, girt, girl, whirl, and firm, are the only exceptions to this rule; where i is pronounced like e, and as if the words were written, merth, berth, and ferm.

109. The letter r, in this caſe, ſeems to have the ſame influence on this word, as it evidently has on a and o. When theſe vowels come before double r, or ſingle r, followed by a vowel, as in arable, carry, marry, orator, horrid, forage, &c. they are conſiderably ſhorter than when the r is the final letter of the word, or when it is ſucceeded by another conſonant, as in arbour, car, mar, or, nor, for. In the ſame manner, the i, coming before either double r, or ſingle r, followed by a vowel, preſerves its pure, ſhort ſound, as in irritate, conſpiracy, &c.; but when r is followed by another conſonant, or is a final letter of a word with the accent upon it, the i goes into a deeper and broader ſound, equivalent to ſhort e, as heard in virgin, virtue, &c. So fir, a tree, is perfectly ſimilar to the firſt ſyllable of ferment, though often corruptly pronounced like fur, a ſkin. Sir and ſtir are exactly pronounced as if written Sur and ſtur. It ſeems, ſays Mr. Nares, that our anceſtors diſtinguiſhed theſe ſounds more correctly. Biſhop Gardiner, in his firſt letter to Cheke, mentions a witticiſm of Nicholas Rowley, a fellow Cantab. with him to this effect: "Let handſome girls be called virgins, plain ones vurgins."

"Si pulchra eſt, virgo, ſin turpis, vurgo vocetur."

Which, ſays Mr. Elphinſton, may be moderniſed by the aid of a far more celebrated line:

"Sweet virgin can alone the fair expreſs,
"Fine by degrees, and beautifully leſs:
"But let the hoyden, homely, rough-hewn vurgin,
"Engroſs the homage of a Major Sturgeon."

110. The ſound of i, in this ſituation, ought to be the more carefully attended to, as letting it fall into the ſound of u, where it ſhould have the ſound of e, has a groſſneſs in it approaching to vulgarity. Perhaps the only exception to this rule is when the ſucceeding vowel is u; for this letter being a ſemi-conſonant, has ſome influence on the preceding i, though not ſo much as a perfect conſonant would have. This makes Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation of the i in virulent, and its compounds, like that in virgin, leſs exceptionable than I at firſt thought it; but ſince we cannot give a ſemi-ſound of ſhort i to correſpond to the ſemi-conſonant ſound of u, I have preferred the pure ſound which I think the moſt agreeable to polite uſage.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

111. There is an irregular pronunciation of this letter which has greatly multiplied within theſe few years, and that is, the ſlender ſound heard in ee. This ſound is chiefly found in words derived from the French and Italian languages; and we think we ſhow our breeding by a knowledge of thoſe tongues, and an ignorance of our own:

"Report of faſhions in proud Italy,
"Whoſe manners ſtill our tardy apiſh nation
"Limps after, in baſe awkward imitation."
Shakeſpeare, Richard II.

When Lord Cheſterfield wrote his letters to his ſon, the word oblige was, by many polite ſpeakers, pronounced as if written obleege, to give a hint of their knowledge of the French language; nay, Pope has rhymed it to this ſound:

"Dreading ev'n fools, by flatterers beſieg'd,
"And ſo obliging, that he ne'er oblig'd."

But it was ſo far from having generally obtained; that Lord Cheſterfield ſtrictly enjoins his ſon to avoid this pronunciation as affected. In a few years, however, it became ſo general, that none but the loweſt vulgar ever pronounced it in the Engliſh manner; but upon the publication of this nobleman's letters, which was about twenty years after he wrote them, his authority has had ſo much influence with the polite world as to bid fair for reſtoring the i, in this word, to its original rights; and we not unfrequently hear it now pronounced with the broad Engliſh i, in thoſe circles where, a few years ago, it would have been an infallible mark of vulgarity.

Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnſton, and Mr. Barclay, give both ſounds, but place the ſound of oblīge firſt. Mr. Scott gives both, but places obleege firſt. Dr. Kenrick and Buchanan give only oblīge; and Mr. Elphinſton, Mr. Perry, and Fenning, give only obleege; but though this ſound has loſt ground ſo much, yet Mr. Nares, who wrote about twelve years ago, ſays oblige, ſtill I think retains the ſound of long e, notwithſtanding the proſcription of that pronunciation by the late Lord Cheſterfield.

112. The words that have preſerved the foreign ſound of i, like ee, are the following: Ambergris, verdegris, antique, becaſico, bombaſin, braſil, capivi, capuchin, colbertine, chioppine, caprice, chagrin, chevaux de friſe, critique (for criticiſm), feſtucine, frize, gabardine, haberdine, ſordine, rugine, trephine, quarantine, routine, faſcine, fatigue, intrigue, glacis, invalid, machine, magazine, marine, palanquin, pique, police, profile, recitative, tabourine, tambourine, tontine, tranſmarine, ultramarine. In all theſe words, if for the laſt i we ſubſtitute ee, we ſhall have the true pronunciation. In ſignior the firſt i is thus pronounced. Mr. Sheridan pronounces vertigo and ſerpigo, with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, and the i long, as in tie and pie. Dr. Kenrick gives theſe words the ſame accent, but ſounds the i, as e in tea and pea. The latter is, in my opinion, the preferable pronunciation. But if the Engliſh ear were unbiaſſed by the long i in Latin, which fixes the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, and could free itſelf from the ſlaviſh imitation of the French and Italians, there is little doubt but theſe words would have the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and that the i would be pronounced regularly like the ſhort e, as in Indigo and Portico. See VERTIGO.

113. There is a remarkable alteration in the ſound of this vowel, in certain ſituations, where it changes to a ſound equivalent to initial y. The ſituation that occaſions this change is, when the i precedes another vowel in an unaccented ſyllable, and is not preceded by any of the dentals: thus we hear iary in mil-iary, bil-iary, &c. pronounced as if written mil-yary, bil-yary, &c. Min-ion and pin-ion, as if written min-yon and pin-yon. In theſe words the i is ſo totally altered to y, that pronouncing the ia and io in ſeparate ſyllables would be an error the moſt palpable; but where the other liquids or mutes precede the i in this ſituation, the coalition is not ſo neceſſary: for though the two latter ſyllables of convivial, participial, &c. are extremely prone to unite into one, they may, however, be ſeparated, provided the ſeparation be not too diſtant. The ſame obſervations hold good of e, as malleable, pronounced mal-ya-ble.

114. But the ſound of the i, the moſt difficult to reduce to rule, is, when it ends a ſyllable, immediately before the accent. When either the primary or ſecondary accent is on this letter, it is invariably pronounced either as the long i in title, the ſhort i in tittle, or the French i in magazine; and when it ends a ſyllable after the accent, it is always ſounded like e, as ſen-ſi-ble, ra-ti-fy, &c. But when it ends a ſyllable, immediately before the accent, it is ſometimes pronounced long, as in vi-ta-li-ty, where the firſt ſyllable is exactly like the firſt of vi-al; and ſometimes ſhort, as in di-geſt, where the i is pronounced as if the word were written de-geſt. The ſound of the i, in this ſituation, is ſo little reducible to rule, that none of our writers on the ſubject have attempted it; and the only method to give ſome idea of it, ſeems to be the very laborious one of claſſing ſuch words together as have the i pronounced in the ſame manner, and obſerving the different combinations of other letters that may poſſibly be the cauſe of the different ſounds of this.

115. In the firſt place, where the i is the only letter in the firſt ſyllable, and the accent is on the ſecond, beginning with a conſonant, the vowel has its long diphthongal ſound, as in idea, identity, idolatry, idoneous, iraſcible, ironical, iſoſceles, itinerant, itinerary. Imagine and its compounds ſeem the only exceptions. But to give the inſpector ſome idea of general uſage, I have ſubjoined examples of theſe words as they ſtand in our different Pronouncing Dictionaries:

īdea. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, Kenrick. ĭdea. Perry.
īdentity. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, Kenrick. ĭdentity. Perry.
īdolatry. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, Kenrick.

īdoneus. Sheridan, Kenrick. īraſcible. Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnſton. Kenrick. ĭraſcible. Perry.

ītinerary. Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnſton, Kenrick. ĭtinerary. Perry.
ĭtinerant. Buchanan, Perry.

116. When i ends the firſt ſyllable, and the accent is on the ſecond, commencing with a vowel, it generally preſerves its diphthongal ſound. Thus in di-ameter, di-urnal, &c. the firſt ſyllable is equivalent to the verb to die. A corrupt, foreign manner of pronouncing theſe words may ſometimes mince the i into e, as if the words were written de-ameter, de-urnal, &c.; but this is diſguſting to every juſt Engliſh ear, and contrary to the whole current of analogy. Beſides; the vowel that ends, and the vowel that begins a ſyllable, are, by pronouncing the i long, kept more diſtinct, and not ſuffered to coaleſce, as they are apt to do if i has its ſlender ſound. This proneneſs of the e, which is exactly the ſlender ſound of i to coaleſce with the ſucceeding vowel, has produced ſuch monſters in pronunciation as joggraphy and jommetry for geography and geometry; and jorgics for georgics. The latter of theſe words is fixed in this abſurd pronunciation without remedy; but the two former ſeem recovering their right to four ſyllables; though Mr. Sheridan has endeavoured to deprive them of it, by ſpelling them with three. Hence we may obſerve, that thoſe who wiſh to pronounce correctly, and according to analogy, ought to pronounce the firſt ſyllable of bi-ography, as the verb to buy, and not as if written be-ography.

117. When i ends an initial ſyllable without the accent, and the ſucceeding ſyllable begins with a conſonant, the i is generally ſlender, as if written e. But the exceptions to this rule are ſo numerous, that nothing but a catalogue will give a tolerable idea of the ſtate of pronunciation in this point.

118. When the prepoſitive bi, derived from bis (twice) ends a ſyllable immediately before the accent, the i is long and broad, in order to convey more preciſely the ſpecific meaning of the ſyllable. Thus bi-capſular, bi-cipital, bi-cipitous, bi-cornous, bi-corporal, bi-dental, bi-farious, bi-furcated, bi-linguous, bi-nocular, bi-pennated, bi-petalous, bi-quadrate, have the i long.

119. The ſame may be obſerved of words beginning with tri, having the accent on the ſecond ſyllable. Thus tri-bunal, tri-corporal, tri-chotomy, tri-gintals, have the i ending the firſt ſyllable long, as in tri-al. To this claſs ought to be added, di-petalous and di-lemma, though the i in the firſt ſyllable of the laſt word is pronounced like e, and as if written de-lemma, by Mr. Scott and Mr. Perry, but long by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Buchanan; and both ways by W. Johnſton, but placing the ſhort firſt. And hence we may conclude, that the verb to bi-ſect, and the noun bi-ſection, ought to have the i at the end of the firſt ſyllable, pronouncing like buy, as Mr. Scott and Dr. Kenrick have marked it, though otherwiſe marked by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan.

120. When the firſt ſyllable is chi, with the accent on the ſecond, the i is generally long, as chi-ragrical, chi-rurgic, chi-rurgeon, chi-rographiſt, chi-rographer, chi-rography. Chi-mera and chi-merical have the i moſt frequently ſhort, as pronounced by Buchanan and Perry; though otherwiſe marked by Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnſton, and Kenrick; and, indeed, the ſhort ſound ſeems now eſtabliſhed. Chicane, and chicanery, from the French, have the i always ſhort; or more properly ſlender.

121. Ci before the accent has the i generally ſhort, as ci-vilian, ci-vility, and, I think, ci-licious and ci-nerulent, though otherwiſe marked by Mr. Sheridan. Ci-barious and ci-tation have the i long.

122. Cli before the accent has the i long, as cli-macter.

123. Cri before the accent has the i generally long, as cri-nigerous, cri-terion; though we ſometimes hear the latter as if written cre-terion, but I think improperly.

124. Di before the accented ſyllable, beginning with a conſonant, has the i almoſt always ſhort; as digeſt, digeſtion, digreſs, digreſſion, dilute, dilution, diluvian, dimenſion, dimenſive, dimidiation, diminiſh, diminutive, diploma, direct, direction, diverſify, diverſification, diverſion, diverſity, divert, divertiſement, divertive, diveſt, diveſture, divide, dividable, dividant, divine, divinity, diviſible, diviſibility, divorce, divulge. To theſe, I think, may be added, dicacity, didactic, dilacerate, dilaceration, dilaniate, dilapidation, dilate, dilatable, dilatability, dilection, dilucid, dilucidate, dilucidation, dinetical, dinumeration, diverge, divergent, divan; though Mr. Sheridan has marked the firſt i in all theſe words long; ſome of them may undoubtedly be pronounced either way; but why he ſhould make the i in diploma long, and W. Johnſton ſhould give it both ways, is unaccountable; as Mr. Scott, Buchanan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and the general uſage, is againſt them. Diæreſis and dioptrics have the i long, according to the general rule (116), though the laſt is abſurdly made ſhort by Dr. Kenrick, and the diphthong is made long in the firſt by Mr. Sheridan, contrary to one of the moſt prevailing idioms in pronunciation; which is, the ſhortening power of the antepenultimate accent (503). Let it not be ſaid that the diphthong muſt be always long, ſince Cæſarea and Dædalus have the æ always ſhort.

125. The long i, in words of this form, ſeems confined to the following: Digladiation, dijudication, dinumeration, divaricate, direption, diruption. Both Johnſon and Sheridan, in my opinion, place the accent of the word didaſcalic improperly upon the ſecond ſyllable; it ſhould ſeem more agreeable to analogy to claſs it with the numerous terminations in ic, and place the accent on the penultimate ſyllable, (509); and, in this caſe, the i in the firſt will be ſhortened by the ſecondary accent, and the ſyllable pronounced like did (527). The firſt i in dimiſſory, marked long by Mr. Sheridan, and with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, contrary to Dr. Johnſon, are equally erroneous. The accent ought to be on the firſt ſyllable, and the i ſhort, as in the adjective dim. See POSSESSORY.

126. Fi before the accent ought always to be ſhort: this is the ſound we generally give to the i in the firſt ſyllable of fi-delity; and why we ſhould give the long ſound to the i in fiducial and fiduciary, as marked by Mr. Sheridan, I know not: he is certainly erroneous, in marking the firſt i in frigidity long, and equally ſo in placing the accent upon the laſt ſyllable of finite. Finance has the i ſhort univerſally.

127. Gigantic has the i in the firſt ſyllable always long.

128. Li has the i generally long, as li-bation, li-brarian, li-bration, li-centious, li-pothymy, li-queſcent, li-thography, li-thotomy. Litigious has the i in the firſt ſyllable always ſhort. The ſame may be obſerved of libidinous, though otherwiſe marked by Mr. Sheridan.

129. Mi has the i generally ſhort, as in minority, militia, mimographer, minacious, minacity, miraculous; though the four laſt are marked with the long i by Mr. Sheridan; and what is ſtill more ſtrange, he marks the i which has the accent on it long in minatory; though the ſame word, in the compound comminatory, where the i is always ſhort, might have ſhewn him his error. The word mimetic, which, though in very good uſe, is neither in Johnſon nor Sheridan, ought to be pronounced with the firſt i ſhort, as if written mim-et-ic. The i is generally long in micrometer, micrography, and migration.

130. Ni has the i long in nigreſcent. The firſt i in nigrification, though marked long by Mr. Sheridan, is ſhortened by the ſecondary accent (527), and ought to be pronounced as if divided into nig-ri-fi-cation.

131. Phi has the i generally ſhort, as in philanthropy, philippic, philoſopher, philoſophy, philoſophize; to which we may certainly add, philologer, philologiſt, philology, philological, notwithſtanding Mr. Sheridan has marked the i in theſe laſt words long.

132. Pi and pli have the i generally ſhort, as pilaſter, pituitous, piloſity, plication. Piaſter and piazza, being Italian words, have the i ſhort before the vowel, contrary to the analogy of words of this form (166), where the i is long, as in pi-acular, pri-ority, &c. Piratical has the i marked long by Mr. Sheridan, and ſhort by Dr. Kenrick. The former is, in my opinion, more agreeable both to cuſtom and analogy, as the ſound of the i before the accent is often determined by the ſound of that letter in the primitive word.

133. Pri has the i generally long, as in primeval, primevous, primitial, primero, primordial, privado, privation.

134. Ri has the i ſhort, as in ridiculous. Rigidity is marked with the i long by Mr. Sheridan, and ſhort by Dr. Kenrick: the latter is undoubtedly right. Rivality has the i long in the firſt ſyllable, in compliment to rival, as piratical has the i long, becauſe derived from pirate. Rhinoceros has the i long in Sheridan, Scott, Kenrick, W. Johnſton, and Buchanan; and ſhort in Perry.

135. Si has the i generally ſhort, as ſimilitude, ſiriaſis, and ought certainly to be ſhort in ſilicious, (better written cilicious,) though marked long by Mr. Sheridan. Simultaneous having the ſecondary accent on the firſt ſyllable, does not come under this head, but retains the i long, notwithſtanding the ſhortening power of the accent it is under. (527).

136. Ti has the i ſhort, as in timidity.

137. Tri has the i long, for the ſame reaſon as bi, which ſee. (118).

138. Vi has the i ſo unſettled as to puzzle the correcteſt ſpeakers. The i is generally long in vicarious, notwithſtanding the ſhort i in vicar. It is long in vibration, from its relation to vibrate. Vitality has the i long, like vital. In vivifick, vivificate, and viviparous, the firſt i is long, to avoid too great a fameneſs with the ſecond. Vivacecus and vivacity have the i almoſt as often long as ſhort; Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Dr. Kenrick, make the i in vivacious long, and Mr. Perry and Buchanan ſhort; Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnſton, make the i in the firſt of vivacity long, and Perry and Buchanan ſhort: but the ſhort ſound ſeems leſs formal and moſt agreeable to polite uſage. Vicinity, vicinal, viciſitude, vituperate, vimineous, and virago, ſeem to prefer the ſhort i, though Mr. Sheridan has marked the three laſt words with the firſt vowel long. But the diverſity will be beſt ſeen by giving the authorities for all theſe words:

Vīcinity. Dr. Kenrick.
Vĭcinity. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, and Perry.
Vīcinal. Mr. Sheridan.
Vīciſſitude. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnſton, Buchanan, and Perry.
Vītuperate. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnſton.
Vĭtuperate. Mr. Perry.
Vīmineous. Mr. Sheridan.
Vīrago. Mr. Sheridan, and W. Johnſton.
Vĭrago. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, and Perry.

I have claſſed vicinal here as a word with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable as it ſtands in Sheridan's Dictionary, but think it ought to have the accent on the firſt. See MEDICINAL.

139. The ſame diverſity and uncertainty in the ſound of this letter ſeem to reign in thoſe final unaccented ſyllables which are terminated with the mute e. Perhaps the beſt way to give ſome tolerable idea of the analogy of the language in this point, will be, to ſhow the general rule, and mark the exceptions; though theſe are ſometimes ſo numerous as to make us doubt of the rule itſelf; in which caſe, the beſt way will be to give a catalogue of both.

140. There is, however, one rule of very great extent, in words of this termination, which have the accent on the penultimate ſyllable, and that is, that the i in the final ſyllable of theſe words is ſhort. Thus ſervile, hoſtile, reſpite, depoſite, adamantine, amethyſtine, &c. are pronounced as if written ſervil, hoſtil, reſpit, depoſit, &c. The only exceptions in this numerous claſs of words ſeem to be the following: Exile, ſenile, edile, empire, umpire, rampire, feline, ferine, archives; the ſubſtantives, cònfine, and sùpine: while the adjectives ſaline and contrite have ſometimes the accent on the firſt, and ſometimes on the laſt ſyllable; but in either caſe the i is long. Quagmire and piſmire have the i long alſo; likewiſe has the i long, but otherwiſe has it more frequently ſhort. Myrrhine, vulpine, and gentile, though marked with the i long by Mr. Sheridan, ought, in my opinion, to conform to the general rule, and be pronounced with the i ſhort. Vulpine, with the i long, is adopted by Mr. Scott; and W. Johnſton, Mr. Scott, and Buchanan, agree with Mr. Sheridan in the laſt ſyllable of gentile; and this ſeems agreeable to general uſage, though not to analogy. See VULPINE.

141. But when the accent is on the laſt ſyllable but two in words of this termination, the length of the vowel is not ſo eaſily aſcertained.

142. Thoſe ending in ice have the i ſhort, except ſacrifice and cockatrice.

143. Thoſe ending in ide have the i long, notwithſtanding we ſometimes hear ſuicide abſurdly pronounced, as if written ſuicid.

144. Thoſe ending in ife have the i long, except houſewife, pronounced huzzwiff, according to the general rule, notwithſtanding the i in wife is always long. Midwife is ſometimes ſhortened in the ſame manner by the vulgar; and ſe'nnight, for ſevennight, is gone irrecoverably into the ſame analogy; though fortnight, for fourteennight, is more frequently pronounced with the i long than ſhort.

145. Thoſe ending in ile have the i ſhort, except reconcile, chammile, eſtipile. Juvenile, mercantile, and puerile, have the i long in Sheridan's Dictionary, and ſhort in Kenrick's. In my opinion the latter is the much more prevalent and polite pronunciation; but infantile, though pronounceable both ways, ſeem inclinable to lengthen the i in the laſt ſyllable. See JUVENILE.

146. In the termination ime, pantomime has the i long, rhyming with time; and maritime has the i ſhort, as if written maritim.

147. Words in ine, that have the accent higher than the penultimate ſyllable, have the quantity of i ſo uncertain, that the only method to give an idea of it will be to exhibit a catalogue of words where it is pronounced differently.

148. But firſt it may not be improper to ſee the different ſounds given to this letter in ſome of the ſame words by different orthöepiſts:

Columbīne. Sheridan, Nares, W. Johnſton.
Columbĭne. Kenrick, Perry.
Saccharīne. Sheridan, Nares.
Saccharĭne. Kenrick, Perry.
Saturnīne. Sheridan, Nares, Buchanan.
Saturnĭne. Kenrick, Perry.
Metallīne. Kenrick.
Metallĭne. Sheridan, W. Johnſton, Perry.
Cryſtallīne. Kenrick.
Cryſtallĭne. Sheridan, Perry.
Uterīne. Sheridan, Buchanan, W. Johnſton.
Uterĭne. Kenrick, Scott, Perry.

149. In theſe words, I do not heſitate to pronounce, that the general rule inclines evidently to the long i, which, in doubtful caſes, ought always to be followed; and for which reaſon I ſhall enumerate thoſe words firſt where I judge the i ought to be pronounced long. Canabine, carabine, columbine, bizantine, gelantine, legatine, oxyrrhodine, concubine, muſcadine, incarnadine, celandine, almandine, ſecundine, amygdaline, cryſtalline, vituline, calamine, aſinine, ſaturnine, ſaccharine, adulterine, viperine, uterine, lamentine, armentine, ſerpentine, turpentine, veſpertine, belluine, porcupine, countermine, leonine, ſapphirine, and, I think, metalline.

150. The words of this termination, where the i is ſhort, are the following: Jacobine, medicine, diſcipline, maſculine, jeſſamine, feminine, heroine, nectarine, libertine, genuine, hyaline, palatine. To theſe, I think, ought to be added, alkaline, aquiline, coralline, brigantine, eglantine: and to this pronunciation of the i, the proper names, Valentine and Conſtantine, ſeem ſtrongly to incline, and Cymbeline has entirely adopted.

151. The only words ending in ire, with the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable, is acroſpire: and in this the i is long; the laſt ſyllable ſounding like the ſpire of a church.

152. Words ending in iſe have the i ſhort, when the accent is on the laſt ſyllable but one, as franchiſe, except the compounds ending in wiſe, as likewiſe, lengthwiſe, &c. as marked by Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan: but even among theſe words we ſometimes hear otherwiſe pronounced otherwiz, as marked by Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnſton; but, I think, improperly.

153. When the accent is on the laſt ſyllable but two in theſe words, they are invariably pronounced with the i long, as criticiſe, equaliſe.

154. In the termination ite, when the accent is on it, the i is always long, as requite. When the accent is on the laſt ſyllable but one, it is always ſhort, as reſpite, (140); pronounced as if written reſpit, except contrite; but when the accent is on the laſt ſyllable but two, the i is generally long: the exceptions, however, are ſo many, that a catalogue of both will be the beſt rule.

155. The i is long in expedite, recondite, incondite, hermaphrodite, carmelite, theodolite, coſmopolite, chryſolite, bedlamite, eremite, aconite, margarite, marcaſite, paraſite, appetite, bipartite, tripartite, quadripartite, convertite, anchorite, pituite, ſatellite. As the word ſtands in Kenrick's Dictionary ſa-tĕll-it, having the i ſhort, and the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, it is doubly wrong. The i in the laſt ſyllable is ſhortened alſo by W. Johnſton and Perry, but made long, as it ought to be, by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott and Mr. Nares. See RECONDITE.

156. The i is ſhort in cucurbite, ingenite, definite, indefinite, infinite, hypocrite, favourite, requiſite, pre-requiſite, perquiſite, exquiſite, appoſite, and oppoſite. Heteroclite has the i long in Sheridan, but ſhort in Kenrick. The former is, in my opinion, the beſt pronunciation, (ſee the word in the Dictionary); but ite, in what may be called a Gentile termination, has the i always long, as in Hivite, Samnite, coſmopolite, &c.

157. The termination ive, when the accent is on it, is always long, as in hive, except in the two verbs, give, live, and their compounds, giving, living, &c.; for the adjective live, as a live animal, has the i long, and rhymes with ſtrive; ſo has the adjective and adverb, lively, and livelily: the noun livelihood follows the ſame analogy; but the adjective live-long, as the live-long day, has the i ſhort, as in the verb. When the accent is not on the i in this termination it is always ſhort, as ſportive, plaintive, &c. rhyming with give.

158. All the other adjectives and ſubſtantives of this termination, when the accent is not on it, have the i invariably ſhort, as offenſive, defenſive, &c. The i in ſalique is ſhort, as if written ſallick, but long in oblique, rhyming with pike, ſtrike, &c.: while the i in antique has the i long and ſlender, and rhymes with ſpeak. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Elphinſton, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Barclay, have obleek for oblique; Mr. Scott has it both ways, but gives the ſlender ſound firſt; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, and W. Johnſton, oblike. The latter is, in my opinion, more agreeable to polite uſage, but the former more analogical: for as it comes from the French oblique, we cannot write it oblike, as Mr. Nares wiſhes, any more than antique and antike, for fear of departing too far from the Latin antiquus and obliquus. Opaque, Mr. Nares obſerves, has become opake; but then it muſt be remembered, that the Latin is opacus, and not opaquus.

159. All the terminations in ize have the i long, except to endenize; which, having the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, follow the general rule, and has the i ſhort, pronounced as in the verb is, (140). To theſe obſervations we may add, that though evil and devil ſuppreſs the i, as if written ev'l and dev'l, yet that cavil and pencil preſerve its ſound diſtinctly, and that Latin ought never to be pronounced as it is generally at ſchools, as if written Latt'n. Couſin and cozen both drop the laſt vowels, as if ſpelled cozn, and are only diſtinguiſhable to the eye.

Thus we ſee how little regularity there is in the ſound of this letter, when it is not under the accent, and, when cuſtom will permit, how careful we ought to be to preſerve the leaſt trace of analogy, that, "confuſion may not be worſe confounded." The ſketch that has been juſt given may, perhaps, afford ſomething like a clew to direct us in this labyrinth, and it is hoped it will enable the judicious ſpeaker to pronounce with more certainty and deciſion.

160. It was remarked under the vowel A, that when a hard g or c preceded that vowel, a ſound like e interpoſed, the better to unite the letters, and ſoften the ſound of the conſonant. The ſame may be obſerved of the letter I. When this vowel is preceded by hard g or k, which is but another form for hard c, it is pronounced as if an e were inſerted between the conſonant and the vowel. Thus ſky, kind, guide, guiſe, diſguiſe, guile, beguile, mankind, are pronounced as if written ſke-y ke-ind, gue-iſe, diſgue-iſe, gue-ile, begue-ile, manke-ind. At firſt ſight we are ſurpriſed that two ſuch different letters as a and i ſhould be affected in the ſame manner by the hard gutturals, g, c, and k; but when we reflect that i is really compoſed of a and e, our ſurpriſe ceaſes; and we are pleaſed to find the ear perfectly uniform in its procedure, and entirely unbiaſſed by the eye. From this view of the analogy we may ſee how greatly miſtaken is a very ſolid and ingenious writert on this ſubject, who ſays that "ky-ind for kind is a monſter of pro-"nunciation, heard only on our ſtage." Nares' Orth. p. 28. See No. 92.

It may not perhaps ſeem unworthy of notice, that when this letter is unaccented in the numerous terminations ity, ible, &c. it is frequently pronounced like ſhort u, as if the words ſenſible, viſible, &c. were written ſenſubble, viſubble, &c. and charity, chaſtity, &c. like charutty, chaſtutty, &c.; but it may be obſerved, that the pure ſound of i like e in theſe words is as much the mark of an elegant ſpeaker as that of the u in ſingular, educate, &c. See No. 179.

O.

161. Grammarians have generally allowed this letter but three ſounds. Mr. Sheridan inſtances them in not, note, prove. For a fourth, I have added the o in love, dove, &c. for the fifth, that in or, nor, for; and a ſixth, that in woman, wolf, &c.

162. The firſt, and only peculiar ſound of this letter, is, that by which it is named in the alphabet. It requires the mouth to be formed, in ſome degree, like the letter, in order to pronounce it. This may be called its long open ſound, as the o in prove may be called its long ſlender ſound, (65). This ſound we find in words ending with ſilent e, as tone, bone, alone; or when ending a ſyllable with the accent upon it, as mo-tion, po-tent, &c. likewiſe in the monoſyllables, go, ſo, no. This ſound is found under ſeveral combinations of other vowels with this letter, as in moan, groan, bow (to ſhoot with,) low (not high.)

163. The ſecond ſound of this letter is called its ſhort ſound, and is found in not, got, lot, &c. though this, as in the other ſhort vowels, is by no means the ſhort ſound of the former long one, but correſponds exactly to that of a in what, with which the words not, got, lot, are perfect rhymes. The long ſound, to which the o in not and ſot are ſhort ones, is found under the diphthong au in naught, and the ou in ſought; correſponding exactly to the a in hall, ball, &c. The ſhort ſound of this letter, like the ſhort ſound of a in father (78) (79), is frequently, by inaccurate ſpeakers, and chiefly thoſe among the vulgar, lengthened to a middle ſound approaching to its long ſound, the o in or. This ſound is generally heard, as in the caſe of a, when it is ſucceeded by two conſonants. Thus Mr. Smith pronounces broth, froth, and moth, as if written brawth, frawth, and mawth. Of the propriety or impropriety of this, a well-educated ear is the beſt judge; but as was obſerved under the article A, (79), if this be not the ſound heard among the beſt ſpeakers, no middle ſound ought to be admitted, as good orators will ever incline to definite and abſolute ſounds rather than ſuch as may be called non-deſcripts in language.

164. The third ſound of this letter, as was marked in the firſt obſervation, may be called its long ſlender ſound, correſponding to the double o. The words where this ſound of o occurs are ſo few, that it will be eaſy to give a catalogue of them. Prove, move, behove, and their compounds, loſe, do, ado, Rome, poltron, ponton, ſponton, who, whom, womb, tomb. Sponton is not in Johnſon; and this and the two preceding words ought rather to be written with oo in the laſt ſyllable. Gold is pronounced like gold in familiar converſation; but in verſe and ſolemn language, eſpecially that of the Scripture, ought always to rhyme with old, fold, &c. See ENCORE, GOLD, and WIND.

165. The fourth ſound of this vowel is that which is found in love, dove, &c. and the long ſound, which ſeems the neareſt relation to it, is the firſt ſound of o in note, tone, rove, &c. This ſound of o is generally heard when it is ſhortened by the ſucceeding liquids n, m, r, and the ſemivowels v, z, th: and as an ingenious writer has given a catalogue of thoſe words, I ſhall avail myſelf of his labour. Above, affront, allonge, among, among ſt, attorney, bomb, bombard (the noun), borage, borough, brother, cochineal, colour, come, comely, comfit, comfort, company, compaſs, comrade, combat, conduit, coney, conjure, conſtable, covenant, cover, covert, covet, covey, cozen, diſcomfit, done, doth, doſt, dove, dozen, dromedary, front, glove, govern, honey, love, Monday, money, mongrel, monk, monkey, month, mother, none, nothing, one, onion, other, oven, plover, pomegranate, pommel, pother, romage, ſhove, ſhovel, ſloven, ſmother, ſome, Somerſet, ſon, ſovereign, ſponge, ſtomach, thorough, ton, tongue, word, work, wonder, world, worry, worſe, worſhip, wort, worth; to which we may add, rhomb, once, comfrey, and colander.

166. In theſe words the accent is on the o in every word, except pomegranate: but with very few exceptions, this letter has the ſame ſound in the unaccented terminations, oc, ock, od, ol, om, on, op, or, ot, and ſome, as mammoc, caſſock, method, carol, kingdom, union, gallop, tutor, turbot, troubleſome, &c. all which are pronounced as if written mammuc, caſſuck, methud, &c. The o in the adjunct monger, as cheeſemonger, &c. has always this ſound. The exceptions to this rule are technical terms from the Greek or Latin, as Achor, a ſpecies of the herpes; and proper names, as Calor, a river in Italy.

167. The fifth ſound of o is the long ſound produced by r final, or followed by another conſonant, as for, former. This ſound is perfectly equivalent to the diphthong au; and for and former might, on account of ſound only, be written faur and faurmer.

168. O, like A, is lengthened before r, when terminating a monoſyllable, or followed by another conſonant; and, like a too, is ſhortened by a duplication of the liquid; as we may hear by comparing the conjunction or with the ſame letters in torrid, florid, &c. for though the r is not doubled to the eye in florid, yet as the accent is on it, it is as effectually doubled to the ear, as if written florrid; ſo if a conſonant of another kind ſucceed the r in this ſituation, we find the o as long as in a monoſyllable. Thus the o in orchard is as long as in the conjunction or, and that in formal as in the word for: but the o in orifice and forage, where the r is followed by a vowel, the o is as ſhort as if the r were double, and the words written orrifice and forrage.

169. There is a ſixth ſound of o exactly correſponding to the u in bull, full, pull, &c. which, from its exiſting only in the following words, may be called its irregular ſound. Theſe words are, woman, boſom, worſted, wolf, and the proper names, Wolſey, Worceſter, and Wolverhampton.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

170. What was obſerved of the a, when followed by a liquid and a mute, may be obſerved of the o with equal juſtneſs. This letter, like a, has a tendency to lengthen, when followed by a liquid and another conſonant, or by s, ſs, or s and a mute. But this length of o, in this ſituation, ſeems every day growing more and more vulgar: and, as it would be groſs to a degree to ſound the a in caſtle, maſk, and plant, like the a in palm, pſalm, &c. ſo it would be equally exceptionable to pronounce the o in moſs, droſs, and froſt, as if written mauwſe, drawſe, and frawſt, (78) (79). The o in the compounds of ſolve, as diſſolve, abſolve, reſolve, ſeem the only words where a ſomewhat longer ſound of the o is agreeable to polite pronunciation. On the contrary, when the o ends a ſyllable, immediately before or after the accent, as in po-lite, im-po-tent, &c. there is an elegance in giving it the open ſound nearly as long as in po-lar and po-tent, &c. See DOMESTIC, COLLECT, and COMMAND. It may likewiſe be obſerved, that the o like the e (102) is ſuppreſſed in a final unaccented ſyllable when preceded by c or k, and followed by n; as bacon, beacon, deacon, beckon, reckon, pronounced bak'n, beak'n, deak'n, beck'n, reck'n; and when c is preceded by another conſonant, as falcon, pronounced fawk'n. The o is likewiſe mute in the ſame ſituation, when preceded by d in pardon; pronounced pard'n; but not in Guerdon. It is mute when preceded by p in weapon, capon, &c. pronounced weap'n, cap'n, &c.; and when preceded by s in reaſon, ſeaſon, treaſon, oraiſon, beniſon, deniſon, uniſon, foiſon, poiſon, priſon, damſon, crimſon, advowſon, pronounced reaz'n, treaz'n, &c.; and maſon, baſon, garriſon, leſſon, capariſon, compariſon, diſinheriſon, parſon, and perſon, pronounced mas'n, bas'n, &c. Uniſon, diapaſon, and cargaſon, ſeem, particularly in ſolemn ſpeaking, to preſerve the ſound of o like u, as if written uniſun, diapazun, &c. The ſame letter is ſuppreſſed in a final unaccented ſyllable beginning with t, as Seton, cotton, button, mutton, glutton; pronounced as if written Set'n, cott'n, &c. When x precedes the t, the o is pronounced diſtinctly, as in Sexton. When l is the preceding letter, the o is generally ſuppreſſed as in the proper names Stilton cheeſe, Wilton carpets, and Melton Mowbray, &c. Accurate ſpeakers ſometimes ſtruggle to preſerve it in the name of our great epic poet Milton; but the former examples ſufficiently ſhew the tendency of the language; and this tendency cannot be eaſily counteracted. This letter is likewiſe ſuppreſſed in the laſt ſyllable of blazon, pronounced blaz'n; but is always to be preſerved in the ſame ſyllable of horizon. This ſuppreſſion of the o muſt not be ranked among thoſe careleſs abbreviations found only among the vulgar, but muſt be conſidered as one of thoſe devious tendencies to brevity, which has worn itſelf a currency in the language, and has at laſt become a part of it. To pronounce the o in thoſe caſes where it is ſuppreſſed, would give a ſingularity to the ſpeaker bordering nearly on the pedantic; and the attention given to this ſingularity by the hearer would neceſſarily diminiſh his attention to the ſubject, and conſequently deprive the ſpeaker of ſomething much more deſirable.

U.

171. The firſt ſound of u, heard in tube, or ending an unaccented ſyllable, as in cu-bic, is a diphthongal ſound, as if e were prefixed, and theſe words were ſpelt tewbe and kewbic. The letter u is exactly the pronoun you.

172. The ſecond ſound of u is the ſhort ſound, which tallies exactly with the o in done, ſon, &c. which every ear perceives might, as well for the ſound's ſake, be ſpelt dun, ſun, &c.

173. The third ſound of this letter, and that in which the Engliſh more particularly depart from analogy, is the u in bull, full, pull, &c. The firſt, or diphthongal u in tube, ſeems almoſt as peculiar to the Engliſh as the long ſound of the i in thine, mine, &c.; but here, as if they choſe to imitate the Latin, Italian, and French u, they leave out the e before the u, which is heard in tube, mule, &c. and do not pronounce the latter part of u quite ſo long as the oo in pool, nor ſo ſhort as the u in dull, but with a middle ſound between both, which is the true ſhort ſound of the oo in coo and woo, as may be heard by comparing woo and wool; the latter of which is a perfect rhyme to bull.

174. This middle ſound of u, ſo unlike the general ſound of that letter, exiſts only in the following words: bull, full, pull; words compounded of full, as wonderful, dreadful, &c. bullock, bully, bullet, bulwark, fuller, fulling-mill, pulley, pullet, puſh, buſh, buſhel, pulpit, puſs, bullion, butcher, cuſhion, cuckoo, pudding, ſugar, huſſar, huzza, and put when a verb: but few as they are, except full, which is a very copious termination, they are ſufficient to puzzle Engliſhmen who reſide at any diſtance from the capital, and to make the inhabitants of Scotland and Ireland, (who, it is highly probable, received a much more regular pronunciation from our anceſtors) not unfrequently the jeſt of fools.

175. But vague and deſultory as this ſound of the u may at firſt ſeem, on a cloſer view we find it chiefly confined to words which begin with the mute labials, b, p, f, and end with the liquid labial l, or the dentals s, t, and d, as in bull, full, pull, buſh, puſh, pudding, puſs, put, &c. Whatever, therefore, was the cauſe of this whimſical deviation, we ſee its primitives are confined to a very narrow compaſs: put has this ſound only when it is a verb; for putty, a paſte for glaſs, has the common ſound of u, and rhymes exactly with nutty, (having the qualities of a nut); ſo put, the game at cards, and the vulgar appellation of country put, follow the ſame analogy. All Bull's compounds regularly follow their primitive. But though fuller, a whitener of cloth, and Fulham, a proper name, are not compounded of full, they are ſounded as if they were; while Putney follows the general rule, and has its firſt ſyllable pronounced like the noun put. Pulpit and pullet comply with the peculiarity on account of their reſemblance to pull, though nothing related to it; and butcher and puſs adopt this ſound of u for no reaſon but the nearneſs of their form to the other words: and when to theſe we have added cuſhion, ſugar, cuckoo, huſſar, and the interjection huzza, we have every word in the whole language where the u is thus pronounced.

176. Some ſpeakers, indeed, have attempted to give bulk, and puniſh, this obtuſe ſound of u, but luckily have not been followed. The words which have already adopted it are ſufficiently numerous; and we cannot be too careful to check the growth of ſo unmeaning an irregularity.

177. It muſt be remarked, that this ſound of u, except in the word fuller, never extends to words from the learned languages; for fulminant, fulmination, ebullition, repulſion, ſepulchre, &c. ſound the u as in dull, gull, &c. and the u in pus and puſtule is exactly like the ſame letter in thus. So the pure Engliſh words, buſs, bulge, buſtle, buſtard, buzzard, preſerve the u in its ſecond ſound, as in us, hull, and cuſtard. It may likewiſe not be unworthy of remark, that the letter u is never ſubject to the ſhortening power of either the primary or ſecondary accent; but when accented, is always long, unleſs ſhortened by a double conſonant. See the words DRAMA and MUCULENT, and No. 503, 534.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

178. But the ſtrangeſt deviation of this letter from its regular ſound is in the words buſy, buſineſs, and bury. We laugh at the Scotch for pronouncing theſe words, as if written bewſy, bewſineſs, and bewry; but we ought rather to bluſh for ourſelves in departing ſo wantonly from the general rule as to pronounce them bizzy, bizneſs, and berry.

179. There is an incorrect pronunciation of this letter when it ends a ſyllable, not under the accent which prevails, not only among the vulgar, but is ſometimes found in better company; and that is, giving the u an obſcure ſound, which confounds it with vowels of a very different kind. Thus we not unfrequently hear ſingular, regular, and particular, pronounced as if written ſing-e-lar, reg-e-lar, and par-tick-e-lar; but nothing tends more to tarniſh and vulgarize the pronunciation than this ſhort and obſcure ſound of the unaccented u. It may, indeed, be obſerved, that there is ſcarcely any thing more diſtinguiſhes a perſon of mean and good education than the pronunciation of the unaccented vowels, (547) (558). When vowels are under the accent, the prince and the loweſt of the people, with very few exceptions, pronounce them in the ſame manner; but the unaccented vowels in the mouth of the former have a diſtinct, open, and ſpecific ſound, while the latter often totally ſink them, or change them into ſome other ſound. Thoſe, therefore, who wiſh to pronounce elegantly muſt be particularly attentive to the unaccented vowels; as a neat pronunciation of theſe, forms one of the greateſt beauties of ſpeaking.

Y final.

180. Y final, either in a word or ſyllable, is a pure vowel, and has exactly the ſame ſound as i would have in the ſame ſituation. For this reaſon printers, who have been the great correctors of our orthography, have ſubſtituted the i in its ſtead, on account of the too great frequency of this letter in the Engliſh language. That y final is a vowel, is univerſally acknowledged; nor need we any other proof of it than its long ſound, when followed by e mute, as in thyme, rhyme, &c. or ending a ſyllable with the accent upon it, as buy, cyder, &c. this may be called its firſt vowel ſound.

181. The ſecond ſound of the vowel y is its ſhort ſound, heard in ſyſtem, ſyntax, &c.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

182. The unaccented ſound of this letter at the end of a ſyllable, like that of i in the ſame ſituation, is always like the firſt ſound of e. Thus vanity, pleuriſy, &c. and if ſound alone were conſulted, might be written vanitee, pleuriſee, &c.

183. The exception to this rule is, when f precedes the y in a final ſyllable, the y is then pronounced as long and open as if the accent were on it. Thus juſtify, qualify, &c. have the laſt ſyllable ſounded like that in defy. This long ſound continues when the y is changed into i, in juſtifiable, qualifiable, &c. The ſame may be obſerved of multiply and multipliable, &c.; occupy and occupiable, &c. (512).

184. There is an irregular ſound of this letter when the accent is on it in panegyric, when it is frequently pronounced like the ſecond ſound of e; but would, perhaps, be more correct if its true ſound were preſerved, and it were to rhyme with Pyrrhic; or as Swift does with Satiric:

> "On me when dunces are ſatirick,
> "I take it for a panegyrick."

185. But the moſt uncertain ſound of this letter is, when it ends a ſyllable immediately preceding the accent. In this caſe it is ſubject to the ſame variety as the letter i in the ſame ſituation, and nothing but a catalogue will give us any idea of the analogy of the language in this point.

186. The y is long in chylaceous, but ſhortened by the ſecondary accent in chylifaction and chylifactive, (530); though, without the leaſt reaſon from analogy, Mr. Sheridan has marked them both long.

187. Words compoſed of hydro, from the Greek ὕδωρ, water, have the y before the accent generally long, as hydrography, hydrographer, hydrometry, hydropic; all which have the y long in Mr. Sheridan but hydrography, which muſt be a miſtake of the preſs; and this long ſound of y continues in hydroſtatic, in ſpite of the ſhortening power of the ſecondary accent, (530). The ſame ſound of y prevails in hydraulics and hydatides. Hygrometer and hygrometry ſeem to follow the ſame analogy, as well as hyperbola and hyperbole; which are generally heard with the y long; though Kenrick has marked the latter ſhort. Hypoſtaſis and hypotenuſe ought to have the y long likewiſe. In hypotheſis the y is more frequently ſhort than long; and in hypothetical it is more frequently long than ſhort; but hypocriſy has the firſt y always ſhort. Myrabolan and myropoliſt may have the y either long or ſhort. Mythology has the firſt y generally ſhort, and mythological, from the ſhortening power of the ſecondary accent, (530), almoſt always. Phytivorous, phytography, phytology, have the firſt y always long. In phylactory the firſt y is generally ſhort, and in phyſician always. Pylorus has the y long in Mr. Sheridan, but, I think, improperly. In pyramidal he marks the y long, though, in my opinion, it is generally heard ſhort, as in pyramid. In pyrites, with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, he marks the y ſhort, much more correctly than Kenrick, who places the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and marks the y long, (ſee the word). Synodic, ſynodical, ſynonima, and ſynopſis, have the y always ſhort: ſynechdoche ought likewiſe to have the ſame letter ſhort, as we find it in Perry's and Kenrick's Dictionaries; though in Sheridan's we find it long. Typography and typographer ought to have the firſt y long, as we find it in Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, Kenrick, and Perry, though frequently heard ſhort; and though tyrannical has the y marked ſhort by Mr. Perry, it ought rather to have the long ſound, as we ſee it marked by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, and Kenrick.

188. From the view that has been taken of the ſound of the i and y immediately before the accent, it may juſtly be called the moſt uncertain part of pronunciation. Scarcely any reaſon can be given why cuſtom prefers one ſound to the other in ſome words; and why, in others, we may uſe either one or the other indiſcriminately. It is ſtrongly to be preſumed that the i and y, in this ſituation, particularly the laſt, was generally pronounced long by our anceſtors, but that cuſtom has gradually inclined to the ſhorter ſound as more readily pronounced, and as more like the ſound of theſe letters when they end a ſyllable after the accent; and, perhaps, we ſhould contribute to the regularity of the language, if, when we are in doubt, we ſhould rather incline to the ſhort than the long ſound of theſe letters.

W final.

189. That w final is a vowel, is not diſputed (9); when it is in this ſituation, it is equivalent to oo; as may be perceived in the ſound of vow, tow-el, &c. where it forms a real diphthong, compoſed of the a in wa-ter, and the oo in woo and coo.

It is often joined to o at the end of a ſyllable, without affecting the ſound of that vowel; and in this ſituation it may be called ſervile, as in bow, to ſhoot with; crow, low (not high), &c.

DIPHTHONGS.

190. A diphthong is a double vowel, or the union or mixture of two vowels pronounced together, ſo as only to make one ſyllable: as the Latin a e or æ, o e or œ, the Greek ει, the Engliſh ai, au, &c.

191. This is the general definition of a diphthong; but if we examine it cloſely, we ſhall find in it a want of preciſion and accuracy*. If a diphthong be two vowel ſounds in ſucceſſion, they muſt neceſſarily form two ſyllables, and therefore, by its very definition, cannot be a diphthong; if it be ſuch a mixture of two vowels as to form but one ſimple ſound, it is very improperly called a diphthong; nor can any ſuch ſimple mixture exiſt.

192. The only way to reconcile this ſeeming contradiction, is to ſuppoſe that two vocal ſounds in ſucceſſion were ſometimes pronounced ſo cloſely together as to form only the time of one ſyllable in Greek and Latin verſe. Some of theſe diphthongal ſyllables we have in our own language, which only paſs for monoſyllables in poetry. Thus hire (wages) is no more than one ſyllable in verſe, though perfectly equivalent to higher (more high) which generally paſſes for a diſſyllable: the ſame may be obſerved of dire or dyer, hour and power, &c. This is not uniting two vocal ſounds into one ſimple ſound, which is impoſſible, but pronouncing two vocal ſounds in ſucceſſion ſo rapidly and ſo cloſely as to go for only one ſyllable in poetry.

193. Thus the beſt definition I have found of a diphthong is that given us by Mr. Smith in his Scheme for a French and Engliſh Dictionary. "A diphthong (ſays this "gentleman) I would define to be two ſimple vocal ſounds "uttered by one and the ſame emiſſion of breath, and "joined in ſuch a manner that each loſes a portion of its "natural length; but from the junction produceth a com-"pound ſound, equal in the time of pronouncing to either "of them taken ſeparately, and ſo making ſtill but one "ſyllable."

194. "Now if we apply this definition (ſays Mr. Smith) "to the ſeveral combinations that may have been laid "down and denominated diphthongs by former orthö-"epiſts, I believe we ſhall find only a ſmall number of "them meriting this name." As a proof of the truth of this obſervation, we find, that moſt of thoſe vocal aſſemblages that go under the name of diphthongs emit but a ſimple ſound, and that not compounded of the two vowels, but one of them only, ſounded long: thus pain and pane, pail and pale, hear and here, are perfectly the ſame ſounds.

195. Theſe obſervations naturally lead us to a diſtinction of diphthongs into proper and improper. The proper are ſuch as have two diſtinct vocal ſounds, and the improper ſuch as have but one.

* We ſee how many diſputes the ſimple and ambiguous nature of vowels created among grammarians, and how it has begot the miſtake concerning diphthongs: all that are properly ſo are ſyllables, and not diphthongs, as intended to be ſignified by that word. Holder.

196 The proper diphthongs are,

ea ocean	io paſſion	oy boy
eu feud	oi voice	ua aſſuage
ew jewel	ou pound	ue manſuetude
ia poniard	ow now	ui languid.
ie ſpaniel

In this aſſemblage it is impoſſible not to ſee a manifeſt diſtinction between thoſe which begin with e or i, and the reſt. In thoſe beginning with either of theſe vowels we find a ſqueezed ſound like the commencing or conſonant y interpoſe, as it were, to articulate the latter vowel, and that the words where theſe diphthongs are found, might, agreeably to the ſound, be ſpelt oſhe-yan, ſ-yude, j-yewel, ponyard, ſpan-yel, paſh-yon, &c.; and as theſe diphthongs (which, from their commencing with the ſound of y conſonant, may not improperly be called ſemi-conſonant diphthongs) begin in that part of the mouth where s, c ſoft, and t are formed, we find that coaleſcence enſue which forms the aſpirated hiſs in the numerous terminations ſion, tion, tial, &c. and by direct conſequence in thoſe ending in ure, une, as future, fortune, &c. for the letter u, when long, is exactly one of theſe ſemi-conſonant diphthongs, (8); and when immediately after the accent it coaleſces with the preceding s, c, or t, and draws them into the aſpirated hiſs of ſh or tſh, (459). Thoſe found in the termination ious may be called ſemi-conſonant diphthongs alſo, as the o and u have but the ſound of one vowel. It may be obſerved too, in paſſing, that the reaſon why in manſuetude the s does not go into ſh is, becauſe when u is followed by another vowel it drops its conſonant ſound at the beginning, and becomes merely double o.

197. The improper diphthongs are,

ea Cæſar	ea clean	ie friend
ai aim	ee reed	oa coat
ao gaol	ei ceiling	oe oeconomy
au taught	eo people	oo moon
aw law	ey they	ow crow.

198. The triphthongs having but two ſounds are merely ocular, and muſt therefore be claſſed with the proper diphthongs:

aye (for ever)	eou plenteous	iew view
eau beauty	ieu adieu	oeu manoeuvre.

Of all theſe combinations of vowels we ſhall treat in their alphabetical order.

AE.

199. Ae or æ is a diphthong, ſays Dr. Johnſon, of very frequent uſe in the Latin language, which ſeems not properly to have any place in the Engliſh; ſince the æ of the Saxons has been long out of uſe, being changed to e ſimple; to which, in words frequently occurring, the æ of the Romans is, in the ſame manner, altered, as in equator, equinctial, and even in Eneas.

200. But though the diphthong æ is perfectly uſeleſs in our language, and the ſubſtitution of e in its ſtead, in Ceſar and Eneas, is recommended by Dr. Johnſon, we do not find his authority has totally annihilated it; eſpecially in proper names and technical terms, derived from the learned languages. Cæſar, Æneas, Æſop, pæan, æther, æthiops mineral, amphiſbæna, anacephalæoſis, aphæreſis, ægilops, ozæna, &c. ſeem to preſerve the diphthong as well as certain words which are either plurals or genitives, in Latin words not naturaliſed, as cornucopiæ, exuviæ, aqua vitæ, minutiæ, ſtriæ, &c.

201. This diphthong, when not under the accent, in Michaelmas, and when accented in Dædalus, is pronounced like ſhort e. It is, like e, ſubject to the ſhort ſound when under the ſecondary accent, as in Ænobarbus, where æn, in the firſt ſyllable, is pronounced exactly like the letter n, (530).

AI.

202. The ſound of this diphthong is exactly like the long ſlender ſound of a; thus pail, a veſſel, and pale, a colour, are perfectly the ſame ſound. The exceptions are but few.

203. When ſaid is the third perſon preterimperfect tenſe of the verb to ſay, ai has the ſound of ſhort e, and ſaid rhymes with bed: but when this word is an adjective, as the ſaid man, it is regular, and rhymes with trade.

204. Plaid, a ſtriped garment, rhymes with mad.

205. Raillery is a perfect rhyme to ſalary; and raiſin, a fruit, is pronounced exactly like reaſon, the diſtinctive faculty of man. See both theſe words in the Dictionary.

206. Again and againſt ſound as if written agen and agenſt.

207. The aiſle of a church is pronounced exactly like iſle, an iſland; and is ſometimes written ile.

208. When this diphthong is in a final unaccented ſyllable the a is ſunk, and the i pronounced ſhort. Thus mountain, fountain, captain, curtain, villain, are all pronounced as if written mountin, fountin, captin, curtin, villin; but when the laſt word takes an additional ſyllable, the i is dropped, and the a has its ſhort ſound; as villanous, villany. See the words in the Dictionary.

209. The ai in Britain has the ſhort ſound approaching to u, ſo common with all the vowels in final unaccented ſyllables, and is pronounced exactly like Briton.

210. Plait, a fold of cloth, is regular, and ought to be pronounced like plate, a diſh; pronouncing it ſo as to rhyme with meat is a vulgariſm, and ought to be avoided.

211. Plaiſter belongs no longer to this claſs of words, being now more properly written plaſter, rhyming with caſter.

AO.

212. This combination of vowels in a diphthong is only to be met with in the word gaol, now more properly written, as it is pronounced, jail.

AU.

213. The general ſound of this diphthong is that of the noun awe; as taught, caught, &c. or of the a in hall, ball, &c.

214. When theſe letters are followed by n and another conſonant, they change to the ſecond ſound of a, heard in far, farther, &c. Thus aunt, haunt, daunt, aſkaunce, aſkaunt, flaunt, haunt, gauntlet, jaunt, haunch, launch, craunch, jaundice, laundry, have the Italian ſound of the a in the laſt ſyllable of papa and mamma. To theſe I think ought to be added, daunt, paunch, gaunt, and ſaunter, as Dr. Kenrick has marked them with the Italian a, and not as if written dawnt, pawnch, &c. as Mr. Sheridan ſounds them. Maund, a baſket, is always pronounced with the Italian a, and nearly as if written marnd; for which reaſon Maundy Thurſday, which is derived from it, ought, with Mr. Nares, to be pronounced in the ſame manner, though generally heard with the ſound of aw. To maunder, to grumble, though generally heard as if written mawnder, ought certainly to be pronounced as Mr. Nares has claſſed it, with the Italian a. The ſame may be obſerved of taunt, which ought to rhyme with aunt, though ſounded tawnt by Mr. Sheridan; and being left out of the above liſt, ſuppoſed to be ſo pronounced by Mr. Nares. But Mr. Elphinſton has placed the analogy of theſe words in ſo ſtrong and curious a light, that I cannot help preſenting them to the reader in his own words, though a different orthography: "U meritoriouſly diſtinguiſhes aunt, "the parent's ſiſter, from ant the emmet, and gives a ſlender ſhut, the ſervile of a broad open,, yet without pretence of ſo dangerous or any coincidence; in defiance of "both ſiſters, his aunt had power to retain the company of "jaunt, haunt, vaunt, taunt, daunt, gaunt, gauntlet; in all "of which the u does preciſely the ſame duty it formerly "did in chaunt, graunt, maund, and commaund; in ſaunter "and ſaunder; as well as in braunch, haunch, paunch, "launch, ſtaunch; all now juſtly as genealogically, chant, "grant, mand (the old baſket), command, ſanter, ſander; "branch, hanch, panch, lanch, ſtanch. Jaundice alone "pleaded u radical; and yet was found mere jandice. "So with aunt, muſt return to truth and etymology (who "do not always join iſſue), jant, hant, vant, tant, dant, "gant, gantlet; and even the venerable Mandy Thurſday, "with her mand or baſket in her hand. She had, indeed, "almoſt left the language, though Aſtrea had not left the "land, when analogy (or harmony) enacted: a broad (au) "ſhall not in Engliſh precede n, followed either by a dry "dental, or by a ſibilation; that is, au ſhall not be followed by nt, nd, nce, nch, or nge. No ſuch ſounds being "ſufferable in the Engliſh ſyſtem, as aunt, aund, aunch, "aunce, or aunge; there ſhall be no ſuch ſemblances. "Alike are therefore indiſpenſable chant and jant; hand "and mand, chance and lance, branch and lanch, banter "and ſanter; Sande and his full ſelf Alexander. In all "ſuch, a, far from broad or open, is ſlender and ſhut; "yet hardly ſhorter than if the ſilent aſpiration interpoſed "in ahnt, ſahnter, lahnce, lahnch, and the reſt. Before "nge, indeed, a is alſo ſlender, but open; not ah, but a; "guarded therefore by its own (i) ſervile (as we ſaw in its "place) againſt every danger of change. Faun and fawn "remain doubtleſs in fauns and fawns, unaltered by the "adſcititious depreſſive ſibilant." Propriety Aſcertained in her Picture, vol. i. pag. 171.

215. Laugh and draught, which are very properly claſſed by Mr. Nares among theſe words which have the long Italian a in father, are marked by Mr. Sheridan with his firſt ſound of a in hat, lengthened into the ſound of a in father, by placing the accent on it. Staunch is ſpelled without the u by Johnſon, and therefore improperly claſſed by Mr. Nares in the above liſt.

216. Vaunt and avaunt ſeem to be the only real exceptions to this ſound of a in the whole liſt; and as theſe words are chiefly confined to tragedy, they may be allowed to "fret and ſtrut their hour upon the ſtage" in the old traditionary ſound of awe.

217. This diphthong is pronounced like long o in hautboy, as if written ho-boy; and like o ſhort in cauliflower, laurel, and laudanum; as if written colliflower, lorrel, and loddanum. In gauge, au has the ſound of ſlender a, and rhymes with page.

218. There is a corrupt pronunciation of this diphthong among the vulgar, which is, giving the au in daughter, ſauce, ſaucer, and ſaucy, the ſound of the Italian a, and nearly as if written darter, ſarce, ſarcer, and ſarcy; but this pronunciation cannot be too carefully avoided. Au in ſauſage alſo, is ſounded by the vulgar with ſhort a, as if written ſaſſage; but in this, as in the other words, au ought to ſound awe. See the words in the Dictionary.

AW.

219. Has the long broad ſound of a in ball, with which the word bawl is perfectly identical. It is always regular.

AY.

220. This diphthong, like its near relation ai, has the ſound of ſlender a in pay, day, &c. and is pronounced like long e in the word quay, which is now ſometimes ſeen written key; for if we cannot bring the pronunciation to the ſpelling, it is looked upon as ſome improvement to bring the ſpelling to the pronunciation: a moſt pernicious practice in language. See Bowl.

221. To flay, to ſtrip off the ſkin, alſo, is corruptly pronounced flea; but the diphthong in this word ſeems to be recovering its rights.

222. There is a wanton departure from analogy in orthography, by changing the y in this diphthong to i in the words paid, ſaid, laid, for payed, ſayed, and layed. Why theſe words ſhould be written with i and thus contracted, and played, prayed, and delayed, remain at large, let our wiſe correctors of orthography determine. Stayed alſo, a participial adjective, ſignifying ſteady, is always written ſtaid.

223. When ay comes immediately after the accent in a final ſyllable, like ai, it drops the former vowel, in the colloquial pronunciation of the days of the week. Thus as we pronounce captain, curtain, &c. as if written captin, curtin, &c. ſo we hear Sunday, Monday, &c. as if written Sundy, Mondy, &c. A more diſtinct pronunciation of day, in theſe words, is a mark of the northern dialect, (208).

224. The familiar aſſent ay for yes, is a combination of the long Italian a in the laſt ſyllable of papa, and the firſt ſound of e. If we give the a the ſound of that letter in ball, the word degenerates into a coarſe ruſtic pronunciation. Though in the Houſe of Commons, where this word is made a noun, we frequently, but not correctly, hear it ſo pronounced, in the phraſe the ayes have it.

AYE.

225. This triphthong is a combination of the ſlender ſound of a, heard in pa-per, and the e in me-tre. The word which it compoſes, ſignifying ever, is almoſt obſolete.

EA.

226. The regular ſound of this diphthong, is that of the firſt ſound of e in here; but its irregular ſound of ſhort e is ſo frequent, as to make a catalogue of both neceſſary; eſpecially for thoſe who are unſettled in the pronunciation of the capital, and wiſh to practiſe in order to form a habit.

227. The firſt ſound of ea is like open e, and is heard in the following words: Afeard, affear, anneal, appeal, appear, appeaſe, aread, arrear, beacon, beadle, beadroll, beads, beadſman, beagle, beak, beaker, beam, bean, beard, bearded, beaſt, beat, beaten, beaver, beleaguer, beneath, bequeath, bereave, beſmear, beſpeak, bleach, bleak, blear, bleat, bohea, breach, bream, to breathe, ceaſe, cheap, cheat, clean, cleanly (adverb) clear, clearance, cleave, cochineal, colleague, conceal, congeal, cream, creak, creaſe, creature, deacon, deal, dean, deanery, dear, deceaſe, defeaſance, defeaſible, defeat, demean, demeanor, decreaſe, dream, drear, dreary, each, eager, eagle, eagre, ear, eaſt, eaſter, eaſy, to eat, eaten, eaves, entreat, endear, eſcheat, fear, fearful, feaſible, feaſibility, feaſt, feat, feature, flea, fleam, freak, gear, gleam, glean, to greaſe, greaſe, greaves, heal, heap, hear, heat, heath, heathen, heave, impeach, increaſe, inſeam, interleave, knead, to lead, leaf, league, leak, lean, leaſe, leaſh, leaſing, leaſt, leave, leaves, mead, meagre, meal, mean, meat, meaſles, meath, neat, neap, near, neat, pea, peace, peak, peal, peaſe, peat, plea, plead, pleaſe, reach, to read, ream, reap, rear, rearward, reaſon, recheat, redſtreak, releaſe, repeal, repeat, retreat, reveal, ſcreak, ſcream, ſeal, ſea, ſeam, ſeamy, ſean, ſear, ſearcloth, ſeaſon, ſeat, ſhear, ſhears, ſheath, ſheathe, ſheaf, ſleaſy, ſneak, ſneaker, ſneakup, ſpeak, ſpear, ſteal, ſteam, ſtreak, ſtream, ſtreamer, ſtreamy, ſurceaſe, tea, teach, tead, teague, teal, team, tear, teaſe, teat, treacle, treaſon, treat, treatiſe, treatment, treaty, tweag, tweak, tweague, veal, underneath, uneaſy, unreave, uprear, weak, weaken, weal, weald, wean, weanling, wearineſs, weariſome, weary, weaſand, weaſel, weave, wheal, wheat, wheaten, wreak, wreath, wreathe, wreathy, yea, year, yeanling, yearling, yearly, yeſt, zeal.

228. In this catalogue we find beard and bearded ſometimes pronounced as if written berd and berded: but this corruption of the diphthong, which Mr. Sheridan has adopted, ſeems confined to the Stage. See the word.

229. The preterimperfect tenſe of eat is ſometimes written ate, particularly by Lord Bolingbroke, and frequently, and, perhaps, more correctly, pronounced et, eſpecially in Ireland; but eaten always preſerves the ea long.

230. Ea in fearful is long when it ſignifies timorous, and ſhort when it ſignifies terrible, as if written ferful. See the word.

231. To read is long in the preſent tenſe, and ſhort in the paſt, and participle; which are ſometimes written red.

232. Teat, a dug, is marked by Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Elphinſton, and Mr. Nares, with ſhort e like tit; but more properly by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnſton, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, with the long e, rhyming with meat.

233. Beat, the preterimperfect tenſe, and participle of to beat, is frequently pronounced in Ireland like bet (a wager): and if utility were the only object of language, this would certainly be the preferable pronunciation, as nothing tends more to obſcurity than verbs which have no different form for their preſent and paſt-times; but faſhion in this, as in many other caſes, triumphs over uſe and propriety; and bet, for the paſt time and participle of beat, muſt be religiouſly avoided.

234. Ea is pronounced like the ſhort e in the following words: Abreaſt, ahead, already, bedſtead, behead, beſpread, beſtead, bread, breadth, breakfaſt, breaſt, breath, cleanſe, cleanly (adjective) cleanlily, dead, deadly, deaf, deafen, dearth, death, earl, earldom, early, earn, earneſt, earth, earthen, earthly, endeavour, feather, head, heady, health, heard, hearſe, heaven, heavy, jealous, impearl, inſtead, lead, leaden, leant (the paſt time and participle of to lean), learn, learning, leather, leaven, meadow, meant, meaſure, pearl, peaſant, pheaſant, pleaſant, pleaſantry, pleaſure, read (paſt time and participle) readily, readineſs, ready, realm, rehearſal, rehearſe, reſearch, ſeamſtreſs, ſearce, ſearch, ſpread, ſtead, ſteadfaſt, ſteady, ſtealth, ſtealthy, ſweat, ſweaty, thread, threaden, threat, threaten, treachery, tread, treadle, treaſure, uncleanly, wealth, wealthy, weapon, weather, yearn, zealot, zealous, zealouſly.

235. I have given the laſt three words, compounded of zeal, as inſtances of the ſhort ſound of the diphthong, becauſe it is certainly the more uſual ſound; but ſome attempts have lately been made in the Houſe of Commons to pronounce them long, as in the noun. It is a commendable zeal to endeavour to reform the language as well as the conſtitution; but whether, if theſe words were altered, it would be a real reformation, may admit of ſome diſpute. See Enclitical Termination, No. 515, and the word ZEALOT.

236. Heard, the paſt time and participle of hear, is ſometimes corruptly pronounced with the diphthong long, ſo as to rhyme with rear'd; but this is ſuppoſing the verb to be regular; which, from the ſpelling, is evidently not the caſe.

237. It is, perhaps, worth obſervation, that when this diphthong comes before r, it is apt to ſlide into the ſhort u, which is undoubtedly very near the true ſound, but not exactly. Thus pronouncing earl, earth, dearth, as if written url, urth, durth, is a ſlight deviation from the true ſound, which is exactly that of i before r, followed by another conſonant, in virtue, virgin; and that is the true ſound of ſhort e in vermin, vernal, &c. (108).

238. Leant, the paſt time and participle of to lean, is grown vulgar: the regular form leaned is preferable.

239. The paſt time and participle of the verb to leap ſeems to prefer the irregular form; therefore, though we almoſt always hear to leap rhyming with reap, we generally hear leaped written and pronounced leapt, rhyming with wept.

240. Ea is pronounced like long ſlender a in bare, in the following words: Bear, bearer, break, forbear, forſwear, great, pear, ſteak, ſwear, to tear, wear.

241. The word great is ſometimes pronounced as if written greet, generally by people of education, and almoſt univerſally in Ireland; but this is contrary to the fixed and ſettled practice in England. That this is an affected pronunciation, will be perceived in a moment by pronouncing this word in the phraſe, Alexander the Great; for thoſe who pronounce the word greet, in other caſes will generally in this rhyme it with fate. It is true the ee is the regular ſound of this diphthong; but this ſlender ſound of e has, in all probablity, given way to that of a as deeper and more expreſſive of the epithet great.

242. The ſame obſervations are applicable to the word break; which is much more expreſſive of the action when pronounced brake than breek, as it is ſometimes affectedly pronounced.

243. Ea is pronounced like the long Italian a in father, in the following words: Heart, hearty, hearten, hearth, hearken.

244. Ea, unaccented, has an obſcure ſound, approaching to ſhort u in vengeance, ſerjeant, pageant, and pageantry.

EAU.

245. This is a French, rather than an Engliſh, triphthong, being found only in words derived from that language. Its ſound is that of long open o, as beau, bureau, flambeau, portmanteau. In beauty and its compounds it has the firſt ſound of u, as if written bewty.

EE.

246. This diphthong, in all words, except thoſe that end in r, has a ſqueezed ſound of long open e formed by a cloſer application of the tongue to the roof of the mouth, than in that vowel ſingly, which is diſtinguiſhable to a nice ear, in the different ſounds of the verbs to flee and to meet, and the nouns flea and meat. This has always been my opinion; but upon conſulting ſome good ſpeakers on the occaſion, and in particular Mr. Garrick, who could find no difference in the ſound of theſe words, I am leſs confident in giving it to the public. At any rate the difference is but very trifling, and I ſhall therefore conſider ee as equivalent to the long open e.

247. This diphthong is irregular only in the word breeches, pronounced as if written britches. Cheeſecake, ſometimes pronounced chizzake, and breech, britch, I look upon as vulgariſms. Beelzebub, indeed, in proſe, has generally the ſhort ſound of e, as in bell: and when theſe two letters form but one ſyllable, in the poetical contraction of e'er and ne'er, for ever and never, they are pronounced as if written air and nair.

EI.

248. The general ſound of this diphthong ſeems to be the ſame as ey, when under the accent; which is like long ſlender a; but the other ſounds are ſo numerous as to require a catalogue of them all.

249. Ei has the ſound of long ſlender a in deign, vein, rein, reign, feign, feint, veil, heinous, heir, heireſs, inveigh, weigh, neigh, ſkein, reins, their, theirs, eight, freight, weight, neighbour, and their compounds.

250. Ei has the ſound of long open e in here, in the following words and their compounds: to ceil, ceiling, conceit, deceit, receipt, conceive, perceive, deceive, receive, inveigle, ſeize, ſeiſin, ſeignior, ſeignory, ſeine, plebeian. Obeiſance ought to be in the preceding claſs. See the word.

251. Leiſure is ſometimes pronounced as rhyming with pleaſure; but, in my opinion, very improperly; for if it be allowed that cuſtom is equally divided, we ought, in this caſe, to pronounce the diphthong long, as more expreſſive of the idea annexed to it. (241).

252. Either and neither are ſo often pronounced eye-ther and nigh-ther, that it is hard to ſay to which claſs they belong. Analogy, however, without heſitation, gives the diphthong the ſound of long open e, rather than that of i, and rhymes them with breather, one who breathes. This is the pronunciation Mr. Garrick always gave to theſe words; but the true analogical ſound of the diphthong in theſe words is that of the ſlender a, as if written ay-ther and nay-ther. This pronunciation is adopted in Ireland, but is not favoured by one of our orthöepiſts; for Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Elphinſton, Mr. Perry, Mr. Smith, Steele's Grammar, and Dr. Jones, all pronounce theſe words with the diphthong like long e. W. Johnſton alone adopts the ſound of long i excluſively; Dr. Kenrick gives both ēther and īther, but prefers the firſt, but gives neither the ſound of long e excluſively; Mr. Coote ſays theſe words are generally pronounced with the ei like the i in mine. Mr. Barclay gives no deſcription of the ſound of ei in either, but ſays neither is ſometimes pronounced nīther, and by others nēther; and Mr. Nares ſays, "either "and neither are ſpoken by ſome with the ſound of long i; "I have heard even that of long a given to them; but as "the regular way is alſo in uſe, I think it is preferable. "Theſe differences ſeem to have ariſen from ignorance of "the regular ſound of ei."

If by the regular way and the regular ſound of this diphthong Mr. Nares means the long ſound of e, we need only inſpect No. 249 and 250, to ſee that the ſound of a is the general ſound, and therefore ought to be called the regular; but where there are ſo many inſtances of words where this diphthong has the long ſound of e, and cuſtom is ſo uniform in theſe words, there can be no doubt which is the true ſound.

253. Ei has the ſound of long open i, in height and ſleight, rhyming with white and right. Height is, indeed, often heard rhyming with eight and weight, and that among very reſpectable ſpeakers; but cuſtom ſeems to decide in favour of the other pronunciation, that it may better tally with the adjective high, of which it is the abſtract.

254. Ei has the ſound of ſhort e, in the two words heifer and nonpareil, pronounced heffer and nonpenell.

255. This diphthong, when unaccented, like ai (208) drops the former vowel, and is pronounced like ſhort i, in foreign, foreigner, forfeit, forfeiture, kerchief, handkerchief, ſovereign, ſovereignty, ſurfeit, counterfeit.

EO.

256. This diphthong is pronounced like e long in people, as if written peeple; and like e ſhort in leopard and jeopardy, as if written leppard and jeppardy; and in the law terms feoffee, feoffer, and feoffment, as if written feffee, feffer, and feffment.

257. We frequently hear theſe vowels contracted into ſhort e in geography and geometry, as if written jeggraphy and jemmetry; but this groſs pronunciation ſeems daily wearing away, and giving place to that which ſeparates the vowels into two diſtinct ſyllables, as it is always heard in geographical, geometer, geometrical, and geometrician. Georgic is always heard as if written jorgic, and muſt be given up as incorrigible (116).

258. Eo is heard like long u in feod, feodal, feodatory, which are ſometimes written as they are pronounced, feud, feudal, feudatory.

259. Eo, when unaccented, has the ſound of u ſhort in ſurgeon, ſturgeon, dudgeon, gudgeon, bludgeon, curmudgeon, dungeon, luncheon, puncheon, truncheon, burgeon, habergeon; but in ſcutcheon, eſcutcheon, pigeon, and widgeon, the eo ſounds like ſhort i.

260. Eo ſounds like long o in yeoman and yeomanry; the firſt ſyllable of which words rhyme with go, no, ſo. See the word.

261. Eo in galleon, a Spaniſh ſhip, ſounds as if written galloon, rhyming with moon.

EOU.

262. This triphthong is often contracted into one ſyllable in proſe, and poets never make it go for two. In cutaneous and vitreous two ſyllables are palpable; but in gorgeous and outrageous the ſoft g coaleſcing with e ſeems to drop a ſyllable.

263. The triphthong is never found but in an unaccented ſyllable, and generally a final one; and when it is immediately preceded by the dentals d or t, it melts them into the ſounds of j and tch. Thus hideous and piteous are pronounced as if written hijeous and pitcheous. The ſame may be obſerved of righteous, plenteous, bounteous, courteous, beauteous, and duteous, (293) (294).

EU.

264. This diphthong is always ſounded like long u or ew, and is never irregular. Thus feud, deuce, &c. are pronounced as if written fewd, dewce, &c.

EW.

265. This diphthong is pronounced like long u, and is almoſt always regular. There is a corrupt pronunciation of it like oo chiefly in London, where we ſometimes hear dew and new pronounced as if written doo and noo.

266. Shew and ſtrew have almoſt left this claſs, and by Johnſon's recommendation are become ſhow and ſtrow, as they are pronounced. The proper name Shrewſbury, however, ſtill retains the e, though always pronounced Shrowſbury. Sew, with a needle, always rhymes with no; and ſewer, ſignifying a drain, is generally pronounced ſhore; but ſewer, an officer, rhymes with ſewer. See SEWER.

267. Ew is ſometimes pronounced like ew in the verb to chew, but this is groſs and vulgar. To chew ought always to rhyme with new, view, &c.

EWE.

268. This triphthong exiſts only in the word ewe, a female ſheep; which is pronounced exactly like yew, a tree. There is a vulgar pronunciation of this word as if written joe, rhyming with doe, which muſt be carefully avoided. See the word.

EY.

269. When the accent is on this diphthong it is always pronounced like ey, or like its kindred diphthong ei, in vein, reign, &c. Thus bey, dey, grey, prey, they, trey, whey, obey, convey, purvey, ſurvey, hey, eyre, and eyrey, are always heard as if written bay, day, &c. Key and ley are the only exceptions which always rhyme with ſea, (220).

270. Ey, when unaccented, is pronounced like ee; thus, galley, valley, alley, barley, &c. are pronounced as if written gallee, vallee, &c. The noun ſurvey therefore, if we place the accent on the firſt ſyllable, is anomalous. See the word.

EYE.

271. This triphthong is only found in the word eye, which is always pronounced like the letter I.

IA.

272. This diphthong, in the terminations ian, ial, iard, and iate, forms but one ſyllable, though the i in this ſituation, having the ſqueezed ſound of ee perfectly ſimilar to y, gives the ſyllable a double ſound, very diſtinguiſhable in its nature from a ſyllable formed without the i. Thus Chriſtian, filial, poniard, conciliate, ſound as if written Cariſt-yan, fil-yal, pon-yard, concil-yate, and have in the laſt ſyllable an evident duplicity of ſound. (113).

273. In diamond, theſe vowels are properly no diphthong; and in proſe, the word ought to have three diſtinct ſyllables; but we frequently hear it ſo pronounced as to drop the a entirely, and as if written dimond. This, however, is a corruption that ought to be avoided by all elegant ſpeakers.

274. In carriage, marriage, parliament, and miniature, the a is dropped, and the i has its ſhort ſound as if written carridge, marridge, parliment, mineture, (90).

IE.

275. The regular ſound of this diphthong is that of ee, as in grieve, thieve, fiend, lief, liege, auctionier, grenadier, &c. as if written greeve, theeve, feend, &c.

276. It has the ſound of long i in die, hie, lie, pie, tie, vie, as if written dy, hy, &c.

277. The ſhort ſound of e is heard in friend, and the long ſound of the ſame letter in tier, frieze.

278. In variegate the beſt pronunciation is to pronounce both vowels diſtinctly like e, ſo if written vary-e-gate.

279. In the numeral terminations in ieth, as twentieth, thirtieth, &c. the vowels ought alſo to be kept diſtinct; the firſt like open e, as heard in the y in twenty, thirty, &c. and the ſecond like ſhort e, heard in breath, death, &c.

280. In fiery too, the vowels are heard diſtinctly.

281. In orient and ſpaniel, where theſe letters come after a liquid, they are pronounced diſtinctly; and great care ſhould be taken not to let the laſt word degenerate into ſpannel.

282. When theſe letters meet, in conſequence of forming the plurals of nouns, they retain either the long or ſhort ſound they had in the ſingular, without increaſing the number of ſyllables. Thus a fly makes fliet, a lie makes lies, company makes companies, and dignity, dignities. The ſame may be obſerved of the third perſons and paſt participles of verbs, as I fly, he flies, I deny, he denies, he denied, I ſully, he ſullied, &c. which may be pronounced as if written denize, denide, ſullid, &c.

283. When ie is in a termination without the accent, it is pronounced like e only, in the ſame ſituation. Thus braſier, graſier, and glaſier, have the laſt ſyllable ſounded, as if written brazhur, grazhur, and glazhur; or rather as braze-yar, graze-yur, &c.

IEU.

284. Theſe vowels occur in adieu, lieu, purlieu, where they have the ſound of long u, as if written adeu, leu, purleu.

285. In one word, lieutenant, theſe letters are pronounced like ſhort e, as if written lev-tenant.

IEW.

286. Theſe letters occur only in the word view, where they ſound like ee, rhyming with few, new.

IO.

287. When the accent is upon the firſt of theſe vowels they form two diſtinct ſyllables, as priory, violent, violet; the laſt of which is ſometimes corruptly pronounced vi-let.

288. In marchioneſs the i is entirely ſunk, and the unaccented o pronounced, as it uſually is in this ſituation, like ſhort u, as if written marſhuneſs, (352).

289. In cuſhion the o is ſunk, and the word pronounced cuſhin. See the word.

290. In the very numerous termination ion, theſe vowels are pronounced in one ſyllable like ſhort u; but when they are preceded by a liquid, as in million, minion, clarion, &c. (113) the two vowels, though they make but one ſyllable, are heard diſtinctly: the ſame may be obſerved when they are preceded by any of the other conſonants, except ſ and t; as champion, ſcorpion, &c. where the vowels are heard ſeparately: but the termination, tion and ſion, are pronounced in one ſyllable, and exactly like the verb ſhun.

291. The only exception to this rule is, when the t is preceded by s: in this caſe the t goes into tch, and the i is in a ſmall degree audible like ſhort e. This may be heard in queſtion, mixtion, digeſtion, combuſtion, and what is an inſtance of the ſame kind in Chriſtian, as if written queſt-yun, mixt-yun, &c. (464).

IOU.

292. This triphthong, when preceded by a liquid, or any mute but a dental, is heard diſtinctly in two ſyllables, as in bilious, various, glorious, abſtemious, ingenious, copious; but when preceded by the dentals t, ſoft c and s, theſe vowels coaleſce into one ſyllable, pronounced exactly like ſhus: thus precious, factious, noxious, anxious, are pronounced as if written preſh-us, fac-ſhus, nock-ſhus, ang-ſhus.

293. The ſame tendency of theſe vowels to coaleſce after a dental, and draw it to aſpiration, makes us hear tedious, odious, and inſidious, pronounced as if written te-je-us, o-jee-us, and in-ſid-je-us; for as d is but flat t, it is no wonder it ſhould be ſubject to the ſame aſpiration, when the ſame vowels follow. Nay, it may be affirmed, that ſo agreeable is this ſound of the d to the analogy of Engliſh pronunciation, that, unleſs we are upon our guard, the organs naturally ſlide into it. It is not, however, pretended that this is the politeſt pronunciation; for the ſake of analogy it were to be wiſhed it were: but an ignorance of the real powers of the letters, joined with a laudable deſire of keeping as near as poſſible to the orthography, is apt to prevent the d from going into j, and to make us hear o-de-us, te-de-ous, &c. On the other hand, the vulgar, who in this caſe are right by inſtinct, not only indulge the aſpiration of the d, which the language is ſo prone to, but are apt to contract the ſucceeding ſyllable too cloſely, and inſtead of o-je-us and te-je-ous, ſay o-jus and te-jus.

294. It is with ſome ſatisfaction I ſee Mr. Sheridan adopt this pronunciation of theſe terminations, though his manner of ſpelling them is too apt to incline us to a too cloſe contraction of them. Nor can I conceive why he ſhould ſpell melodious, me-lo-dzhus, and commodious, commo-dyus, as there can be no poſſible difference in the ſound of the terminations. If the y is diſtinctly pronounced, it ſufficiently expreſſes the aſpiration of the d, and is, in my opinion, the preferable mode of delineating the ſound, as it keeps the two laſt ſyllables from uniting too cloſely. Where analogy, therefore, is ſo clear, and cuſtom ſo dubious, we ought not to heſitate a moment at pronouncing odious, tedious, perfidious, faſtidious, invidious, compendious, melodious, commodious, preludious, and ſtudious, as if written o-je-ous, te-je-ous, &c. or rather o-dyus, te-dyus, &c.; nor ſhould we forget that Indian comes under the ſame analogy, and ought, though contrary to reſpectable uſage, to be pronounced as if written Indyan, and nearly as In-je-an, (376).

OA.

295. This diphthong is regularly pronounced as the long open ſound of o, as in boat, coat, oat, coal, loaf, &c. The only exceptions are, broad, abroad, groat, which ſound as if written brawd, abrawd, grawt. Oatmeal is ſometimes pronounced ot-meal, but ſeems to be recovering the long ſound of o, as in oat.

OE.

296. Whether it be proper to retain the o in this diphthong, or to baniſh it from our orthography, as Dr. Johnſon adviſes, certain it is, that it is always pronounced like ſingle e, and comes entirely under the ſame laws as that vowel. Thus, when it ends a ſyllable, with the accent upon it, it is long, as in An-toe-ci, Peri-oe-ci. When under the ſecondary accent, in oec-umenical, oec-onomics, it is like e ſhort. It is long e in foe-tus, and ſhort e in foet-id and aſſafoet-ida. In doe, foe, ſloe, toe, throe, hoe (to dig), and bilboes, it is ſounded exactly like long open o. In canoe and ſhoe, like oo, as if written canoo and ſhoo; and in the verb does, like ſhort u, as if written duz.

OEI.

297. There is but one word where this triphthong occurs, and that is in Shakeſpeare's King Lear, in the word oeiliads (glances). If it were neceſſary to pronounce it, in my opinion it ought to be ſounded as if written e-il-yads.

OEU.

298. This diphthong is from the French, in the word manoeuvre; a word, within theſe few years, of very general uſe in our language. It is not in Johnſon, and the oeu is generally pronounced by thoſe who can pronounce French, in the French manner; but this is ſuch a ſound of the u as does not exiſt in Engliſh, and therefore it cannot be deſcribed. The neareſt ſound is oo; with which, if this word is pronounced by an Engliſh ſpeaker, as if written manoovre, it may, except with very nice French ears, eſcape criticiſm.

OI.

299. The general, and almoſt univerſal ſound of this diphthong, is that of a in water, and the firſt e in me-tre. This double ſound is very diſtinguiſhable in boil, toil, ſpoil, joint, point, anoint, &c. which ſound ought to be carefully preſerved, as there is a very prevalent practice among the vulgar of dropping the o, and pronouncing theſe words as if written bile, tile, ſpile, &c.

300. The only inſtance which admits of a doubt in the ſound of this diphthong, when under the accent, is, in the word choir; but this word is now ſo much more frequently written quire, that uniformity ſtrongly inclines us to pronounce the oi in choir like long i, and which, by the common orthography, ſeems fixed beyond recovery. But it may be obſerved, that either the ſpelling or the pronunciation of Choriſter, commonly pronounced Quiriſter, ought to be altered. See the words.

301. When this diphthong is not under the accent, it is variouſly pronounced. Dr. Kenrick places the accent on the firſt ſyllable of turcois, and, for I know not what reaſon, pronounces it as if written turkiz; and turkois with the oi broad, as in boys. Mr. Sheridan places the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, and gives the diphthong the French ſound, as if the word was written turkaze. In my opinion the beſt orthography is turquoiſe, and the beſt pronunciation with the accent on the laſt ſyllable, and the oi ſounded like long e, as if written turkeeze: as we pronounce tortoiſe, with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and the oi like ſhort i, as if written tortiz.

302. In avoirdupois, the firſt diphthong is pronounced like ſhort e, as if written averdupoiſe.

303. In connoiſſeur the ſame ſound of e is ſubſtituted, as if written conneſſeur.

304. In ſhamois, or chamois, a ſpecies of leather, the oi is pronounced like long e, as if written ſhammee.

305. Adroit and devoir, two ſcarcely naturalized French words, have the oi regular.

OO.

306. The ſound of this diphthong is regular, except in a few words. It is pronounced long in moon, ſoon, fool, rood, food, mood, &c. This is its regular ſound.

307. It has a ſhorter ſound correſponding to the u in bull, in the words wool, wood, good, hood, foot, ſtood, underſtood: and theſe are the only words where this diphthong has this middle ſound.

308. It has the ſound of ſhort u in the two words blood and flood, rhyming with mud.

309. Soot is vulgarly pronounced ſo as to rhyme with but, hut, &c. but ought to have its long, regular ſound, rhyming with boot; as we always hear it in the compound ſooty. See the word.

310. Door and flour are univerſally pronounced by the Engliſh as if written dore and flore; but in Ireland they preſerve the regular ſound of oo.

311. Moor, a black man, is regular in polite pronunciation, and like more in vulgar. Moor, a marſh, is ſometimes heard rhyming with flore; but more correct ſpeakers pronounce it regularly, rhyming with poor.

OU.

312. This ſound is the moſt irregular aſſemblage of words in our language. Its moſt common ſound is that heard in bound, found, ground, &c. and this may be called its proper ſound; but its deviations are ſo many and ſo various, that the beſt idea of it will be conveyed by giving the ſimples of all its different ſounds.

313. The firſt or proper ſound of this diphthong is compoſed of the a in ball, and the oo in woo, or rather the u in bull, and is equivalent to the ow in down, frown, &c. This ſound is heard in abound, about, account, accouſtics, aground, aloud, amount, around, arouſe, aſtound, avouch, bough, bounce, bound, bounty, bounteous, bout, carouſe, chouſe, cloud, clough, clout, clouterly, compound, couch, couchant, crouch, deflour, devour, devout, doubt, doubtful, drought, doughty, douſe, encounter, eſpouſe, expound, flout, foul, flounder, found, foundling, fountain, frouſy, glout, gout (a diſeaſe), ground, grout, hound, hour, houſe, impound, loud, lounge, louſe, lout, mound, mountain, mountebank, mouſe, mouth, noun, ounce, our, ouſt, out, outer, outermoſt, paramount, plough, pouch, pounce, pound, pout, profound, pronounce, propound, proud, rebound, recount, redoubt, redoubted, redound, rencounter, round, roundelay, rouſe, rout, ſcoundrel, ſcour, ſcout, ſhout, ſhroud, ſlouch, ſpouſe, ſpout, ſprout, ſtout, ſurround, ſouth, thou, thouſand, touſe, trounce, trouſers, trout, wound (did wind), ſlough (a miry place), vouch, vouchſafe, without, and in pronoun and ſcaramouch; though, in theſe words, the accent is not on the diphthong.

314. The ſecond ſound is that of ſhort u in bud, and is heard in the following words and their compounds: Adjourn, journey, journal, bourgeon, country, couſin, couple, accouple, double, trouble, courteous, courteſy, courage, encourage, jouſt, gournet, houſewife, flouriſh, mounch, nouriſh, enough, chough, rough, tough, ſlough (a caſt ſkin), ſcourge, ſoutherly, ſouthern, ſouthernwood, ſouthward, touch, touchy, young, younker, and youngſter, but ſouthern, ſoutherly, and ſouthward, are ſometimes pronounced regularly like ſouth: this, however, is far from the prevailing pronunciation. This is the ſound this diphthong always has when the accent is not on it, unleſs in very few inſtances, where the compound retains the ſound of the ſimple, as in pronoun; but in ſojourn and ſojourner, with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and in every unaccented termination, in our and ous, this diphthong has exactly the ſound of ſhort u. Thus favour, honour, and famous, are pronounced as if written favur, honur, and famus.

315. The third ſound given to theſe vowels is that of oo in coo and woo (39); and is found in the following words: Bouge, croup, group, aggroup, amour, paramour, houſe, houſy, houſeau, capouch, cartouch, fourbe, gout (taſte), and ragout (pronounced goo and ragoo), rendezvous, rouge, ſoup, ſous (pronounced ſoo), ſurtout, through, throughly, toupee or toupet, you, your, youth, tour, contour, tourney, tournay, tournament, pour, and route (a road), accoutre, billet doux, agouti, uncouth, wound (a hurt), and routine (a beaten road), though the diphthong on the latter has not the accent. See TOURNEY.

316. The verb to pour is ſometimes pronounced to pore, and ſometimes to poor; in each caſe it interferes with a word of a different ſignification, and the beſt pronunciation, which is that ſimilar to power, is as little liable to that exception as either of the others. See the word.

317. To wound is ſometimes pronounced ſo as to rhyme with found; but this is directly contrary to the beſt uſage; but route (a road, as to take a different route), is often pronounced ſo as to rhyme with doubt by reſpectable ſpeakers.

318. The fourth ſound of this diphthong is that of long open o, and is heard in the following words; though, although, coulter, court, accourt, gourd, courtier, courſe, diſcourſe, ſource, recourſe, reſource, bourn, dough, doughy, four, mould, mouldy, moult, mourn, ſhoulder, ſmoulder, ſoul, poultice, poult, poulterer, poultry, troul (to roll ſmoothly, marked by Mr. Sheridan as rhyming with doll, but more properly by Dr. Kenrick with roll), and borough, thorough, furlough, fourteen, concourſe, and intercourſe, preſerve the diphthong in the ſound of long o, though not under the accent.

319. The fifth ſound of ou is like the noun awe, and is heard only in the following words: ought, bought, brought, ſought, beſought, fought, nought, thought, methought, wrought.

320. The ſixth ſound is that of ſhort oo, or the u in bull, and is heard only in the auxiliary verbs would, could, ſhould, rhyming with good, hood, ſtood, &c.

321. The ſeventh ſound is that of ſhort o, and heard only in the words cough, and trough; rhyming exactly with off and ſcoff: and in lough and ſhough, pronounced lock and ſhock.

OW.

322. The elementary ſound of this diphthong is the ſame as the firſt ſound of ou, and is heard in how, now, &c. but the ſound of long o obtains in ſo many inſtances, that it will be neceſſary to give a catalogue of both.

323. The general ſound, as the elementary ſound may be called, is heard in now, how, bow (a mark of reſpect), mow (a heap of barley, &c.) cow, brow, brown, browſe, plow, ſow, vow, avow, allow, diſallow, endow, down, clown, frown, town, crown, drown, gown, renown, dowager, dowdy, dower, dowre, dowry, dowery, dowlas, drowſe, drowſy, flower, bower, lower (to look gloomy). power, powder, proweſs, prow, prowl, vowel, towel, bower, rowel, ſcowl, crowd, ſhower, tower, ſowins, ſowl, thowl, low (to bellow as a cow). This word is generally pronounced as low, not high; but if cuſtom, in this caſe, has not abſolutely decided, it ought, in my opinion, to have the firſt ſound of this diphthong, rhyming with how, as much more expreſſive of the noiſe it ſignifies; which, where ſounds are the ideas to be expreſſed, ought to have great weight in pronunciation, (241) (251).

324. The ſecond ſound of this diphthong is heard in blow, ſlow, crow, grow, flow, glow, bow (to ſhoot with), know, low (not high), mow (to cut graſs), row, ſhow, ſow, (to ſcatter grain) ſtrow, ſlow, ſnow, trow, below, beſtow, own, owner, flown, froward, ſoward, grown, growth, know, known, ſown, lower (to bring low), throw, thrown; in all theſe words the ow ſounds like long o in go, no, ſo, &c.

325. The noun prow, ſignifying the forepart of a ſhip, rhymes with go in Mr. Sheridan, and with now in Dr. Kenrick. The latter is, in my opinion, the preferable ſound; while the verb to prowl (to ſeek for prey) rhymes with owl according to Mr. Sheridan, and with ſoul according to Dr. Kenrick: the latter has the old ſpelling prole to plead, but the former has, in my opinion, both analogy and the beſt uſage on its ſide. Both theſe writers unite in giving the firſt ſound of this diphthong to proweſs; which is unqueſtionably the true pronunciation. See to PROWL.

326. The proper names How, Howel, Howard, and Powel, generally are heard with the firſt ſound of this diphthong, as in how, now, &c. but Howes and Stow (the hiſtorian) commonly rhyme with knows and know. Howard, among people of rank, is generally pronounced with the ſecond ſound, rhyming with froward; and Groſvenor, as if written Grævenor.

> "So much they hate the crowd, that if the throng
> "By chance go right, they purpoſely go wrong." Pope.

Snowdon is frequently pronounced with the firſt ſound of ow; but the ſecond ſound ſeems preferable; as it is not improbable that theſe mountains had their name, like the Alps, from the ſnow on their tops.

327. When this diphthong is in a final unaccented ſyllable it has always the ſecond ſound, like long o, in borrow, ſorrow, fellow, willow, &c. The vulgar ſhorten this ſound, and pronounce the o obſcurely, and ſometimes as if followed by r, as winder and feller, for window and fellow; but this is almoſt too deſpicable for notice. Good ſpeakers preſerve the diphthong in this ſituation as diſtinct as if the accent were on it, and give it the full ſound of open o, rhyming with no, ſo, &c.

328. This diphthong, in the word knowledge, has of late years undergone a conſiderable revolution. Some ſpeakers, who had the regularity of their language at heart, were grieved to ſee the compound depart ſo far from the ſound of the ſimple, and with heroic fortitude have oppoſed the multitude by pronouncing the firſt ſyllable of this word as it is heard in the verb to know. The pulpit and the bar have for ſome years given a ſanction to this pronunciation; but the ſenate and the ſtage hold out inflexibly againſt it; and the nation at large ſeem inſenſible of the improvement. They ſtill continue to pronounce, as in the old ludicrous rhymes——

> "Among the mighty men of knowledge,
> "That are profeſſors at Greſham College."

But if ever this word ſhould have the good fortune to be reſtored to its rights, it would be but charity to endeavour the reſtoration of a great number of words in a ſimilar ſituation, ſuch as breakfaſt, vineyard, bewilder, meadow, hearken, pleaſure, whitſter, ſhepherd, windward, and a long catalogue of fellow ſufferers, (515). But before we endeavour this reſtoration we ſhould conſider, that contracting the ſound of the ſimple, when it acquires an additional ſyllable, is an idiom of pronunciation to which our language is extremely prone; nor is it certain that croſſing this tendency would produce any real advantage; at leaſt, not ſufficient to counterbalance the diverſity of pronunciation which muſt for a long time prevail, and which muſt neceſſarily call off our attention from things to words. See Enclitical Termination.

OY.

329. This diphthong is but another form for oi, and is pronounced exactly like it. When alloy is written with this diphthong, it ought never to be pronounced allay. Cuſtom ſeems to have appropriated the former word to the noun, and the latter to the verb; for the ſake of conſiſtency, it were to be wiſhed it were always written allay; but it is not to be expected that poets will give up ſo good a rhyme to joy, cloy, and deſtroy.

330. The only word in which this diphthong is not under the accent, is the proper name Savoy: for ſavoy, a plant, has the accent on the ſecond ſyllable; but the diphthong in both is pronounced in the ſame manner.

UA.

331. When the a in this diphthong is pronounced, the u has the power of w, which unites both into one ſyllable; thus antiquate, antiquary, aſſuage, perſuade, equal, language, &c. are pronounced antikwate, antikwary, aſſwage, perſwade, ekwal, langwage, &c.

332. The u in this diphthong is ſilent, in guard, guardian, guarantee, and piquant; pronounced gard, gardian, garantee, and pikant, (92).

333. In Mantua, the town of Italy, both vowels are heard diſtinctly. The ſame may be obſerved of the habit ſo called; but in mantuamaker vulgarity has ſunk the a, and made it mantumaker. The ſame vulgarity at firſt, but now ſanctioned by univerſal cuſtom, has ſunk both letters in victuals, and its compounds victualling and victualler, pronounced, vittles, vittling, and vittler. See MANTUA.

UE.

334. This diphthong, like ua, when it forms only one ſyllable, and both letters are pronounced, has the u ſounded like w; as conſuetude, deſſuetude, and manſuetude, which are pronounced conſwetude, deſſwetude, and manſwetude. Thus conqueſt is pronounced according to the general rule, as if written conkweſt; but the verb to conquer has unaccountably deviated into conker, particularly upon the ſtage. This error, however, ſeems not to be ſo rooted in the general ear as to be above correction; and analogy undoubtedly demands conkwer.

335. This diphthong, when in a final ſyllable, ſinks the e, as clue, cue, due, blue, glue, hue, flue, rue, ſue, true, mue, accrue, enſue, endue, imbue, imbrue, purſue, ſubdue, perdue, argue, reſidue, avenue, revenue, continue, retinue, conſtrue, ſtatue, tiſſue, iſſue, virtue, value, ague; in all theſe words, whether the accent be on the diphthong ue or not, it is pronounced like long open u. When the accent is not on this diphthong as in the latter portion of theſe words from argue, it is apt to be feebly and indiſtinctly pronounced, and therefore care ought to be taken to ſound it as if theſe words were written argew, reſidew, &c. In Tueſday, although not ending a ſyllable, the diphthong is pronounced in the ſame manner.

336. In ſome words the u is ſilent, and the e pronounced ſhort, as in gueſs, gueſt, guerkin, guerdon, where the u acts as a ſervile to preſerve the g hard.

337. In ſome words both the vowels are ſunk, as in antique, oblique, league, feague, teague, colleague, plague, vague, intrigue, fatigue, harangue, tongue, diſembogue, collogue, rogue, prorogue, brogue, fugue; in all which the ue is ſilent, and the g pronounced hard. The q in antique and oblique is pronounced like k, as if the words were written anteek and oblike.

338. The terminations in ogue, from the Greek, are pronounced in the ſame manner. Thus pedagogue, demagogue, ptyſmagogue, menagogue, emmenagogue, ſynagogue, myſtagogue, decalogue, dialogue, trialogue, catalogue, theologue, eclogue, monologue, prologue, and epilogue, are all pronounced as if written pedagog, demagog, &c.

339. This diphthong after r becomes oo. Thus true is pronounced troo.

UI.

340. The u in this diphthong, as in ua and ue, when both vowels are pronounced without forming two ſyllables, is pronounced like w; thus languid, anguiſh, languiſh, extinguiſh, diſtinguiſh, relinquiſh, vanquiſh, linguiſt, penguin, purſuivant, guiacum, are pronounced as if written langwid, angwiſh, &c. and cuiſs and cuiſſes, as if written kwiſs and kwiſſes, and cuiraſs, kwiraſs.

341. The u is ſilent, and the i pronounced long, in guide, diſguiſe, guile, and beguile; but the u is ſilent, and the i ſhort, in guild, build, guilt, guinea, guitar. Guild, in Guildhall, is, by the lower people of London, pronounced ſo as to rhyme with child; but this is directly oppoſite to the beſt uſage, and contrary to its etymology; as it is a compound of guild (a corporation, always pronounced like the verb to gild), and hall. Dr. Jones, who wrote in Queen Anne's time, tells us it was then pronounced as if written Gildhall. In circuit and biſcuit the u is merely ſervile; in both the c is hard, and the i ſhort, as if written ſurkit and biſket. Conduit is pronounced condit.

342. In juice, ſluice, ſuit, and purſuit, the i is ſilent, and the u has its diphthongal ſound, as if preceeded by e, and the words were written ſlewce, jewce, ſewt, purſewt.

343. When this diphthong is preceded by r, it is pronounced like oo; thus bruiſe, cruiſe, fruit, bruit, recruit, are pronounced as if written brooſe, crooze, broot, froot, recroot, (339.)

UO.

344. The u in this diphthong, as in the three laſt, is pronounced like w in quote, quota, quotation, quotient, quotidian, quorum, quondam, ſiliquoſe, quoth, as if written kwote, kwota, kwotation, &c. Coif and coit, commonly pronounced kwoif and kwoit, do not come under this claſs. See the words.

UY.

345. This diphthong, with the accent on it, ſinks the u, and pronounces the y like long i; thus buy, the only word where uy has the accent, rhymes with dry, fly, &c. When the accent is not on this diphthong it is ſounded like long e, as plaguy, roguy, gluy, pronounced pla-guee, ro-guee, glu-ee. The ſame may be obſerved of obloquy, ambiloquy, pauciloquy, ſoliloquy, ventriloquy, alloquy, colloquy, pronounced oblo-quee, ambilo-quee, &c.

UOY.

346. This diphthong is found only in the word buoy, pronounced as if written bwoy, but too often exactly like boy. This, however, is an impropriety which ought to be avoided by correct ſpeakers.

OF THE CONSONANTS.

B.

347. WHEN b follows m in the ſame ſyllable it is generally ſilent, as in lamb, kemb, limb, comb, dumb, &c. except accumb and ſuccumb. It is ſilent alſo before t in the ſame ſyllable, as in debt, doubt, redoubt, redoubted, and their compounds. It is ſilent before t, when not in the ſame ſyllable, in the word ſubtle (cunning), often inaccurately uſed for ſubtile (fine), where the b is always pronounced. In the mathematical term rhomb the b is always heard, and the word pronounced as if written rhumb. Ambs-ace is pronounced Aims-ace.

C.

348. C is always heard like k before a, o, and u, as card, cord, curd; and ſoft, like s before e, i, and y, as cement, city, cynic.

349. When c ends a word, or ſyllable, it is always hard, as in muſic, flaccid, ſic-city, pronounced muſick, flack-ſid, ſick-ſity. See EXAGGERATE.

350. In the word ſceptic, where the firſt c, according to analogy, ought to be pronounced like s, Dr. Johnſon has not only given his approbation to the ſound of k, but has, contrary to general practice, ſpelt the word ſkeptic. It may be obſerved, perhaps, in this, as on other occaſions, of that truly great man, that he is but ſeldom wrong; but when he is ſo, that he is generally wrong to abſurdity. What a monſter does this word ſkeptic appear to an eye the leaſt claſſical or correct! and if this alteration be right, why ſhould we heſitate to write and pronounce ſcene, ſcepter, and Lacedæmon, ſkene, ſkepter, and Lakedæmon, as there is the ſame reaſon for k in all? It is not, however, my intention to croſs the general current of polite and claſſical pronunciation, which I know is that of ſounding the c and k; my objection is only to writing it with the k; and in this I think I am ſupported by the beſt authorities ſince the publication of Johnſon's Dictionary.

351. C is mute in Czar, Czarina, victuals, indict, arbuſcle, corpuſcle, and muſcle; it ſounds like tch in the Italian words vermicelli and violincello; and like z in ſuffice, ſacrifice, and diſcern.

352. This letter, when connected with h, has two ſounds; the one like tch, in child, chair, rich, which, &c. pronounced as if written tchild, tchair, ritch, whitch, &c.; the other like ſh, after l or n, as in belch, bench, filch, &c. pronounced belſh, benſh, filſh, &c. This latter ſound is generally given to words from the French, as chaiſe, chagrin, chamade, champagne, champignon, chandelier, chaperon, charlatan, chevalier, cheveron, chicane, capuchin, cartouch, machine, machiniſt, chancre, marchioneſs.

353. Ch, in words from the learned languages, are generally pronounced like k, as chalcography, chalybeate, chamæleon, chamomile, chaos, character, cart, chaſm, chemiſt (if derived from the Arabic, and chymiſt if from the Greek) cherſoneſe, chimera, chirography, chiromancy, chloroſis, choler, chorus, chord, chorography, chyle, and its compounds; anchor, ancboret, cachexy, catechiſm, catechiſe, catechetical, catechumen, echo, echinus, epoch, epocha, ichor, machination, machinal, mechanic, mechanical, orcheſtra, orcheſtre, technical, anarch, anarchy, conch, cochleary, diſtich, hemiſtich, moneſtich, eunuch, monarch, monarchical, hierarch, hereſiarch, pentateuch, ſtomach, ſtomachic, ſcheme, ſchool, ſcholar, ſcheſis, maſtich, and in all words where it is followed by r, as Chriſt, Chriſtian, chronology, chronicle, &c. To theſe may be added the Celtic word loch (a lake). The exceptions to theſe are, charity, charge, archer, and archery.

354. When arch, ſignifying chief, begins a word from the Greek language, and is followed by a vowel, it is always pronounced ark, as in archangel, archipelago, architect, archives, archetype archaiſm, archiepiſcopal, archidiaconal, architrave, archæology. But when we prefix arch to a word of our own, and this word begins with a conſonant, we pronounce it ſo as to rhyme with march, as archduke, archdeacon, archbiſhop; and ſometimes, when the following word begins with a vowel, if it is a compoſition of our own, and the word does not come to us compounded from the Greek or Latin, as arch-enemy.

355. The word ache, (a pain), pronounced ake, comes from the Greek, and was by Shakeſpeare extended to two ſyllables, aches with ch, as in watches; but this is obſolete. It is now almoſt univerſally written ake and akes, except where it is compounded with another word, as head-ach, heart-ach, &c. and by thus abſurdly retaining the ch in the compound, we are puzzled how to form the plural, without pronouncing aches in two ſyllables: but if this remnant of Greek muſt be retained, the beſt way would be to ſpell the compound head-ache, as the ſimple ache, with a final e.

356. In choir and choriſter the ch is almoſt univerſally pronounced like qu (300): in oſtrich, like dge, as ſpelled oſtridge. It is ſilent in ſchedule, ſchiſm, and yacht; pronounced ſeddule, ſizm, and yot. It is ſunk in drachm, but heard in drachma; pronounced dram and drackma.

357. When c comes after the accent, either primary or ſecondary, and is followed by ea, ia, ie, io, or eous, it takes the ſound of ſh; thus ocean, ſocial, Phocion, ſaponaceous, are pronounced as if written oſhean, ſoſhal, Phoſhean, ſaponaſhious, faſciation, negociation, &c. (196).

D.

358. In order to have a juſt idea of the alterations of ſound this letter undergoes, it will be neceſſary to conſider its near relation to T (41). Theſe conſonants, like p, and b, f, and v, k, and hard g, and ſ, and z, are letters of the ſame organ; they differ by the niceſt ſhades of ſound, and are eaſily convertible into each other; t, p, f, k, and ſ, may, for the ſake of diſtinction, be called ſharp, and d, b, v, g, and z, may be called flat. For this reaſon, when a ſingular ends in a ſharp conſonant, the ſ, which forms the plural, preſerves its ſharp ſound, as in cuffs, packs, lips, hats, deaths; and when the ſingular ends with a flat conſonant, the plural ſ, has the ſound of z, as drabs, bags, heads, lives.

359. In the ſame manner, when a verb ends with a ſharp conſonant, the d, in the termination ed, aſſumed by the preterit and participle, becomes ſharp, and is ſounded like t; thus ſtuffed, tripped, cracked, paſſed, vouched, faced, (where the e is ſuppreſſed, as it always ought to be, except when we are pronouncing the language of Scripture) (104) change the d into t, as if written ſtuft, tript, crackt, paſt, voucht, faſte. So, when the verb ends in a flat conſonant, the d preſerves its true flat ſound, as drubbed, pegged, lived, buzzed, where the e is ſuppreſſed, and the words pronounced in one ſyllable, as if written drubb'd, pegg'd, liv'd, buzz'd. It may be obſerved too, that when the verb ends in a liquid, or a liquid and mute e, the participial d always preſerves its pure ſound; as blamed, joined, filled, barred, pronounced blam'd, join'd, fill'd, barr'd. This contraction of the participial ed, and the verbal en (103), is ſo fixed an idiom of our pronunciation, that to alter it, would be to alter the ſound of the whole language. It muſt, however, be regretted, that it ſubjects our tongue to ſome of the moſt hiſſing, ſnapping, claſhing, grinding, ſounds that ever grated the ears of a Vandal. Thus raſped, ſcratched, wrenched, bridled, fangled, birchen, hardened, ſtrengthened, quickened, &c. almoſt frighten us when written as they are actually pronounced, as raſpt, ſcratcht, wrencht, bridl'd, fangl'd, birch'n, ſtrength'n'd, quick'n'd, &c. but to compenſate for theſe Gothick ſounds, which, however, are not without their uſe, our language is full of the ſmootheſt and moſt ſonorous terminations of the Greeks and Romans.

360. By the foregoing rule of contraction, ariſing from the very nature of the letters, we ſee the abſurdity of ſubſtituting the t for ed, when the verb ends in a ſharp conſonant; for, when the pronunciation cannot be miſtaken, it is folly to alter the orthography. Thus the Diſtreſſed Mother, the title of a tragedy, needs not to be written Diſtreſt Mother, as we generally find it, becauſe, though we write it in the former manner, it muſt neceſſarily be pronounced in the latter.

361. By this rule, too, we may ſee the impropriety of writing bleſt for bleſſed, when a participle.

> "Bleſt in thy genius, in thy love too bleſt." Pope.

But when the word bleſſed is an adjective, it ought always to be pronounced, even in the moſt familiar converſation, in two ſyllables, as this is a bleſſed day, the bleſſed thiſtle, &c.

362. This word, with learned, curſed, and winged, are the only participle adjectives which are conſtantly pronounced in two ſyllables, where the participles are pronounced in one: thus a learned man, a curſed thing, a winged horſe, preſerve the ed in a diſtinct ſyllable; while the ſame words, when verbs, as he learned to write, he curſed the day, they winged their flight, are heard in one ſyllable, as if written learnd, curſt, and wingd; the d in curſed changing to t, from its following the ſharp conſonant t, (358).

363. Poetry, however, (which has been one great cauſe of improper orthography) aſſumes the privilege of uſing theſe words, when adjectives, either as monoſyllables or diſſyllables; but correct proſe rigidly exacts the pronunciation of ed in theſe words, when adjectives, as a diſtinct ſyllable. The ed in aged and winged, always make a diſtinct ſyllable, as an aged man; the winged courſer; but when this word is compounded with another, the ed does not form a ſyllable, as a full-ag'd horſe; a ſheath-wing'd fowl.

364. It is, perhaps, worthy of notice, that when adjectives are changed into adverbs by the addition of the termination ly, we often find the participial termination ed preſerved long and diſtinct, even in thoſe very words where it was contracted when uſed adjectively. Thus, though we always hear confeſs'd, profeſs'd, deſign'd, &c. we as conſtantly hear con-feſs-ed-ly, pro-feſs-ed-ly, de-ſign-ed-ly, &c. The ſame may be obſerved of the following liſt of words, which, by the aſſiſtance of the Rhyming Dictionary, I am enabled to give, as, perhaps, the only words in the language in which the ed is pronounced as a diſtinct ſyllable in the adverb, where it is contracted in the participial adjective: Forcedly, enforcedly, unveiledly, deformedly, feignedly, unfeignedly, diſcernedly, reſignedly, refinedly, reſtrainedly, concernedly, unconcernedly, diſcernedly, undiſcernedly, preparedly, aſſuredly, adviſedly, diſperſedly, diffuſedly, confuſedly, unperceivedly, reſolvedly, deſervedly, undeſervedly, reſervedly, unreſervedly, avowedly, perplexedly, fixedly, amazedly.

365. To this catalogue may be added ſeveral abſtract ſubſtantives formed from participles in ed; which ed makes a diſtinct ſyllable in the former, though not in the latter. Thus blearedneſs, preparedneſs, aſſuredneſs, diſeaſedneſs, adviſedneſs, repoſedneſs, compoſedneſs, diffuſedneſs, confuſedneſs, diſtreſſedneſs, reſolvedneſs, reſervedneſs, perplexedneſs, fixedneſs, amazedneſs, have ed pronounced diſtinctly.

366. The adjectives naked, wicked, picked (pointed), hooked, crooked, forked, tuſked, and wretched, are not derived from verbs, and are therefore pronounced in two ſyllables. The ſame may be obſerved of ſcabbed, crabbed, chubbed, ſtubbed, ſhagged, ſnagged, ragged, crabbed, ſcrubbed, dogged, rugged, ſcragged, hawked, jagged; to which we may add, the ſolemn pronunciation of ſtiffnecked; and theſe, when formed into nouns by the addition of neſs, preſerve the ed in a diſtinct ſyllable, as wickedneſs, ſcabbedneſs, raggedneſs, &c.

367. Paſſed, in the ſenſe of beyond, becomes a preposition, and may allowably be written paſt, as paſt twelve o'clock; but when an adjective, though it is pronounced in one ſyllable, it ought to be written with two, as paſſed pleaſures are preſent pain: this I know is contrary to uſage; but uſage is, in this caſe, contrary to good ſenſe, and the ſettled analogy of the language.

368. It needs ſcarcely be obſerved, that when the verb ends in t or d, the ed in the paſt time and participle has the d pronounced with its own ſound, and always forms an additional ſyllable, as landed, matted, &c. otherwiſe the final d could not be pronounced at all.

369. And here, perhaps, it may not be uſeleſs to take notice of the very imperfect and confuſed idea that is given in our beſt grammar, of what are called contracted verbs, ſuch as ſnatcht, checkt, ſnapt, mixt, dwelt, and paſt, for ſnatched, checked, ſnapped, mixed, dwelled, and paſſed. To theſe are added, thoſe that end in l, m, and n, or p, after a diphthong; which either ſhorten the diphthong, or change it into a ſingle vowel; and inſtead of ed, take t only for the preterit, as dealt, dreamt, meant, felt, ſlept, crept; and theſe are ſaid to be conſidered not as irregular, but contracted only. Now nothing can be clearer than that verbs of a very different kind are here huddled together as of the ſame. Snatched, checked, ſnapped, mixed, and paſſed, are not irregular at all; if they are ever written ſnatcht, checkt, ſnapt, mixt, and paſt, it is from pure ignorance of analogy, and not conſidering that if they were written with ed, unleſs we were to pronounce it as a diſtinct ſyllable, contrary to the moſt ſettled uſage of the language, the pronunciation, from the very nature of the letters, muſt be the ſame. It is very different with dwelled; here, as a liquid, and not a ſharp mute, ends the verb, d might be pronounced without going into t juſt as well as in fell'd, the participle of to fell (to cut down trees). Here then we find cuſtom has determined an irregularity, which cannot be altered, without violence to the language; dwell may be truly called an irregular verb, and dwelt the preterit and participle.

370. The ſame may be obſerved of deal, dream, mean, feel, weep, ſleep, and creep. It is certain we can pronounce d after the four firſt of theſe words, as well as in ſealed, ſcreamed, cleaned, and reeled; but cuſtom has not only annexed t to the preterit of theſe verbs, but has changed the long diphthongal ſound into a ſhort one; they are therefore doubly irregular. Weep, ſleep, and creep, would not have required t to form their preterits any more than peeped, and ſteeped; but cuſtom, which has ſhortened the diphthong in the former words, very naturally annexed t as the ſimpleſt method of conveying the ſound.

371. The only two words which occaſion ſome doubt about claſſing them are, to learn and to ſpell. The vulgar (who are no contemptible guides on this occaſion) pronounce them in the preterit learnt and ſpelt; but as n and l will readily admit of d after them, it ſeems more correct to favour a tendency to regularity, both in writing and ſpeaking, which the literary world has given into, by ſpelling them learned and ſpelled, and pronouncing them learn'd and ſpell'd. Thus earned, the preterit of to earn, has been recovered from the vulgar earnt, and made a perfect rhyme to diſcerned.

372. To theſe obſervations may be added, that, in ſuch irregular verbs as have the preſent, the preterit and participle the ſame, as caſt, coſt, cut, &c. the ſecond perſon ſingular of the preterit of theſe verbs take ed before the eſt, as I caſt, or did caſt; Thou caſtedſt, or didſt caſt, &c. for if this were not the caſe, the ſecond perſon of the preterit might be miſtaken for the ſecond perſon of the preſent tenſe, which in theſe words would render "confuſion worſe "confounded."

373. I have been led inſenſibly to theſe obſervations by their connexion with pronunciation; and if the reader ſhould think them too remote from the ſubject, I muſt beg his pardon, and reſume my remarks on the ſound of the letter d.

374. The vulgar drop this letter in ordinary, and ex- traordinary, and make them or'nary and extr'or'nary; but this is a groſs abbreviation; the beſt pronunciation is ſufficiently ſhort, which is ord'nary and extrord'nary; the firſt in three, and the laſt in four ſyllables: but ſolemn ſpeaking preſerves the i, and makes the word conſiſt of five ſyllables.

375. Our anceſtors, feeling the neceſſity of ſhowing the quantity of a vowel followed by ge when it was to be ſhort, inſerted d, as wedge, ridge, badge, &c. The ſame reaſon induced them to write colledge and alledge, with the d; but modern reformers, to the great injury of the language, have expelled the d, and left the vowel to ſhift for itſelf; becauſe there is no d in the Latin words from which theſe are derived.

376. D like t, to which it is ſo nearly related, when it comes after the accent, and is followed by the diphthong ie, io, ia or eou, ſlides into gzh, or the conſonant j; thus ſoldier is univerſally and juſtly pronounced as if written ſol-jer: grandeur, gran-jeur; and verdure (where it muſt be remembered that u is a diphthong) ver-jure; and, for the ſame reaſon, education is elegantly pronounced ed-jucation. But Duke and reduce, pronounced juke and re-juce, where the accent is after the d, cannot be too much reprobated.

F.

377. F has its pure ſound in often, off, &c. but, in the prepoſition of, ſlides into its near relation v, as if written ov. But, when this prepoſition is in compoſition at the end of a word, the f becomes pure; thus, though we ſound of ſingly ov, we pronounce it as if the f were double in whereof.

378. There is a ſtrong tendency to change the f into v in ſome words, which confounds the plural number and the genitive caſe. Thus we often hear of a wive's jointure, a calve's head, and houze rent, for a wife's jointure, a calf's head, and houſe rent.

G.

379. G, like C, has two ſounds, a hard and a ſoft one. It is hard before a, o, u, l, and r, as game, gone, gull, glory, grandeur. Gaol is the only exception; now more commonly written jail, (212).

380. G before e and i is ſometimes hard and ſometimes ſoft. It is generally ſoft before words of Greek, Latin, or French original, and hard before words from the Saxon. Theſe latter, forming by far the ſmaller number, may be conſidered as exceptions.

381. G is hard before e, in gear, geck, geeſe, geld, gelt, gelding, get, gew-gaw, ſhagged, ſnagged, ragged, cragged, ſcragged, dogged, rugged, toged (dreſſed in a toga), dagger, ſwagger, ſlagger, trigger, dogger, pettyfogger, tiger, auger, eager, meager, anger, finger, linger, conger, longer, ſtronger, younger, longeſt, ſtrongeſt, youngeſt. The laſt of theſe words are generally pronounced in Ireland, ſo as to let the g remain in its naſal ſound, without articulating the ſucceeding vowel; thus longer (more long) is ſo pronounced as to ſound exactly like the noun a longer (one who longs or wiſhes for a thing); the ſame may be obſerved of the reſt. That the pronunciation of Ireland is analogical, appears from the ſame pronunciation of g in ſtring-y, ſpring-y, full of ſtrings and ſprings; and wronger and wrongeſt, for more and moſt wrong. But though reſting the g in the naſal ſound, without articulating the ſucceeding vowel, is abſolutely neceſſary in verbal nouns, derived from verbs ending in ing, as ſinger, bringer, ſtinger, &c.; and though analogical, is provincial, in the words above mentioned; for younger ought to rhyme exactly with the termination monger, which has always the g hard, and articulating the vowel; and this pronunciation is approved by Mr. Nares. Forget, target, and together, fall into this claſs.

382. G is hard before i, in gibbe, gibcat, gibber, gibberiſh, gibbous, giddy, giſt, gig, giggle, giglet (properly gigglet), gild, gill (of a fiſh), gimlet, gimp, gird, girdle, girl, girth, gizzard, begin, give, forgive, biggin, piggin, noggin: alſo derivatives from nouns or verbs ending in hard g, as druggiſt, waggiſh, riggiſh, hoggiſh, doggiſh, ſluggiſh, rigging, digging, &c.

383. G before y is generally ſoft, as in elegy, apology, &c. and almoſt in all words from the learned languages; but hard in words from the Saxon, which are formed from nouns or verbs ending in g hard, as ſhaggy, jaggy, knaggy, ſnaggy, craggy, ſcraggy, guaggy, ſwaggy, dreggy, ſpriggy, twiggy, boggy, foggy, cloggy, buggy, muggy. Gyve, from its Celtic original, ought to have the g hard, but has decidedly adopted the ſoft g.

GN in the ſame ſyllable at the beginning of a word.

384. The g in this ſituation is always ſilent, as gnaw, gnaſh, gnat, gnarl, gnomon, gnomonics; pronounced naw, naſh, nat, narl, nomon, nomonics.

GN in the ſame ſyllable at the end of a word.

385. No combination of letters has more puzzled the critics than this. Two actreſſes of diſtinguiſhed merit in Portia, in the Merchant of Venice, pronounced the word impugn differently, and each found her advocate in the newſpapers. One critic affirmed, that Miſs Young, by preſerving the ſound of g, pronounced the word properly; and the other contended, that Mrs. Yates was more judicious in leaving it out. The former was charged with harſhneſs; the latter, with mutilating the word, and weakening its ſound: but if analogy may decide, it is clearly in favour of the latter; for there is no axiom in our pronunciation more indiſputable than that, which makes g ſilent before n in the ſame ſyllable. This is conſtantly the caſe in ſign and all its compounds, as reſign, deſign, conſign, aſſign; and in indign, condign, malign, benign; all pronounced as if written ſine, reſine, &c. In which words we find the vowel i long and open, to compenſate, as it were, for the ſuppreſſion of g; as every other word ending in gn, when the accent is on the ſyllable, has a diphthong pronounced like a long open vowel, as arraign, campaign, feign, reign, deign, and conſequently, unleſs the vowel u can produce ſome ſpecial privilege which the other vowels have not, we muſt, if we pronounce according to analogy, make the u in this ſituation long, and ſound impugn, as if written impune.

386. The ſame analogy will oblige us to pronounce impregn, oppugn, expugn, propugn, as if written imprene, oppune, expune, propune, not only when theſe verbs are in the infinitive mood, but in the preterits, participles, and verbal nouns, formed from them; as impugned, impugning, and impugner, muſt be pronounced impuned, impuning, and impuner. The ſame may be obſerved of the reſt. Perhaps it will gratify a curious obſerver of pronunciation to ſee the diverſity and uncertainty of our orthöepiſts in their notation of the words before us:

impūne. Sheridan, Scott, Nares, Murray, (author of an Engliſh Grammar). Barclay ſays the g in this word and its derivatives is mute, but takes no notice of the quantity of the u. impŭn. Buchanan, Kenrick, Perry.
impŭng. W. Johnſton. oppūne. Sheridan, Scott, Nares, Murray.
oppŭn. Kenrick, Perry, Barclay.
oppŭng. W. Johnſton.
propūne. Sheridan, Scott, Perry, Nares. propŭng. Barclay.
imprēne. Nares, Murray.
imprĕn. Sheridan, Kenrick, Perry. Barclay ſays the g is mute, but ſays nothing of the quantity of the e. expūne. Sheridan, Scott, Nares. expŭn. Perry, Barclay. impūner. Sheridan.
impūned. Murray.
impŭnner. Perry, Barclay.
oppŭgner. Sheridan.
propŭgner. Sheridan.
propūner. Scott.
propŭnner. Perry.

Nothing is clearer than that all theſe words ought to follow the ſame fortune, and ſhould be pronounced alike. How then ſhall be reconciled Mr. Sheridan's pronouncing impugn, oppugn, expugn, and propugn, with the u long, and impregn with the e ſhort? Kenrick, who has not the word propugn, is conſiſtent in pronouncing the reſt with the vowel ſhort. The ſame may be obſerved of Scott, who adopts the long ſound, but has not the word impregn. Mr. Perry gives the ſhort ſound to all but propūgn, where he makes the u long; and W. Johnſton, who has only impugn and oppugn, pronounces the vowel ſhort, and ſpells them impung and oppung. Barclay, under the word impugn, ſays the g in this word and its derivatives is mute, without noticing the quantity of the vowels, but ſpells oppugn, oppún; and of impregn, only ſays the g is mute; but writes propugn, propung, in the manner that W. Johnſton does impugn and oppugn: but Mr. Nares obſerves, that analogy ſeems to require a ſimilar pronunciation in all theſe words, and that the vowel ſhould be long.

The ſame inconſiſtency is obſervable in Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation of the verbal nouns; for he expunges the g in impugner, and writes it impuner, but preſerves it in oppugner and propugner. Mr. Scott has only the word propugner, which he very properly, as well as conſiſtently, ſpells propuner. Mr. Perry has propunner and impunner, and Barclay impunner only.

The inconſiſtency here remarked ariſes from not attending to the analogy of pronunciation, which requires every verbal noun to be pronounced exactly like the verb, with the mere addition of the termination. Thus finger is only adding er to the verb ſing, without ſuffering the g to articulate the e as it does in finger and linger, &c. The ſame may be obſerved of a ſigner, one who ſigns: and as a corroboration of this doctrine, we may take notice that the additional er and eſt, in the comparatives and ſuperlatives of adjectives, makes no alteration in the ſound of the radical word; this is obvious in the words benigner, benigneſt, &c. except younger, longer, and ſtronger. See No. 381.

387. But in every other compound where theſe letters occur, the n articulates the latter ſyllable, and g is heard diſtinctly in the former, as ſig-nify, malig-nity, aſſig-nation, &c. Some affected ſpeakers, either ignorant of the rules for pronouncing Engliſh, or over-complaiſant to the French, pronounce phyſiognomy, cognizance, and recognizance, without the g; but this is a groſs violation of the firſt principles of ſpelling. The only words to keep theſe ſpeakers in countenance are, poignant and champignion, not long ago imported from France, and pronounced poiniant, champinion. The firſt of theſe words will be probably hereafter written without the g; while the latter, confined to the kitchen, may be looked upon as technical, and allowed an excluſive privilege. See COGNIZANCE.

388. Bagnio, ſeignior, ſeraglio, intaglio, and oglio, pronounced ban-yo, ſeen-yor, ſeral-yo, intal-yo, and ole-yo, may be conſidered as foreign coxcombs, and treated with civility, by omitting the g, while they do not pervert the pronunciation of our native Engliſh words.

GM in the ſame ſyllable.

389. What has been ſaid of gn is applicable to gm. We have but one word in the language where theſe letters end a word with the accent on it, and that in phlegm; in this the g is always mute, and the e, according to analogy, ought to be pronounced long, as if the word were written fleme; but a ſhort pronunciation of the e has generally obtained, and we commonly hear it flem. It is highly probable Pope pronounced it properly, where he ſays,

> "Our critics take a contrary extreme;
> "They judge with fury, but they write with phlegm."
> Eſſay on Criticiſm.

Perhaps it would not be difficult to reduce this word to analogy, as ſome ſpeakers ſtill pronounce the e long: but in the compounds of this word, as in thoſe where gn occur, the vowel is ſhortened, and the g pronounced, as in phleg-mon, phleg-monous, phleg-matic, and phleg-magogues; though Mr. Sheridan, for no reaſon I can conceive, ſinks the g in the laſt word. When theſe letters end a ſyllable, not under the accent, the g is ſilent, but the preceding vowel is ſhortened. Thus paradigm, parapegm, diaphragm, apophthegm, are pronounced paradim, parapem, diaphram, apothem.

GH.

390. This combination, at the beginning of a word, drops the h, as in ghoſt, ghaſtly, aghaſt, gherkin; pronounced goſt, rhyming with moſt; gaſtly, agaſt, guerken. But when theſe letters come at the end of a word they form ſome of the greateſt anomalies in our language; gh, at the end of words, is generally ſilent, and conſequently the preceding vowel or diphthong is long, as high, nigh, thigh, neigh, weigh, inveigh, eugh (the obſolete way of ſpelling yew, a tree), bough, dough, though, although, clough (a cliff), plough, furlough, ſlough (a miry place), through, throughout, thorough, borough, uſquebaugh, pugh!

391. Gh is frequently pronounced like f, as laugh, laughter, cough, chough, clough (an allowance in weight), ſlough (the caſt ſkin of a ſnake or ſore), enough, rough, tough, trough.

392. Gh is ſometimes changed into ck, as hough, ſhough, lough; ſometimes we hear only the g ſounded, as in burgh, burgher, and burgherſhip.

GHT.

393. Gh in this termination is always ſilent, as fight, night, bought, fought, &c. The only exception is draught; which, in poetry, is moſt frequently rhymed with caught, taught, &c. but, in proſe, is ſo univerſally pronounced as if written draft, that the poetical ſound of it grows uncooth, and is becoming obſolete. Draughts, the game, is alſo pronounced drafts. Drought (dryneſs) is vulgarly pronounced drouth: it is even written ſo by Milton; but in this he is not to be imitated, having miſtaken the analogy of this word, as well as that of height, which he ſpells heighth, and which is frequently ſo pronounced by the vulgar. See the words HEIGHT and DROUGHT.

H.

394. This letter is no more than breathing forcibly before the ſucceeding vowel is pronounced. At the beginning of words, it is always ſounded, except in heir, heireſs, honeſt, honeſty, honour, honourable, herb, herbage, hoſpital, hoſtler, hour, humble, humour, humourous, humourſome. Ben Jonſon leaves out the h in hoſt, and claſſes it in this reſpect with honeſt.

395. H is always ſilent after r, as rhetoric, rhapſody, rheum, rheumatiſm, rhinoceros, rhomb, rhubarb, myrrh, catarrh, and their compounds.

396. H final, preceded by a vowed, is always ſilent, as ah! hah! oh! foh! ſirrah, hallelujah, Meſſiah.

397. This letter is often ſunk after w, particularly in the capital, where we do not find the leaſt diſtinction of ſound between while and wile, whet, and wet, where, and wear. Trifling as this difference may appear at firſt ſight, it tends greatly to weaken and empoveriſh the pronunciation, as well as ſometimes to confound words of a very different meaning. The Saxons, as Dr. Lowth obſerves, placed the h before the w, as hwat; and this is certainly its true place; for in the pronunciation of all words, beginning with wh, we ought to breathe forcibly before we pronounce the w, as if the words were written hoo-at, hoo-ile, &c. and then we ſhall avoid that feeble, cockney pronunciation, which is ſo diſagreeable to a correct ear.

J.

398. J is pronounced exactly like ſoft g, and is perfectly uniform in its ſound, except in the word hallelujah, where it is pronounced like y.

K.

399. K has exactly the ſound of hard c. It is always ſilent before n in the ſame ſyllable, as knee, kneel, knack, knight, know, knuckle, knab, knag, knap, knare, knave, knit, knock, knot, knoll.

400. It has been a cuſtom within theſe twenty years to omit the k at the end of words, when preceded by c. This has introduced a novelty into the language, which is that of ending a word with an unuſual letter, and is not only a blemiſh in the face of it, but may poſſibly produce ſome irregularity in future formatives; for mimicking muſt be written with the k, though to mimic is without it. If we uſe colic as a verb, which is not uncommon, we muſt write colicking and colicked; and though phyſicking and phyſicked are not the moſt elegant words, they are not quite out of the line of formation. This omiſſion of k is, however, too general to be counteracted, even by the authority of Johnſon; but it is to be hoped it will be confined to words from the learned languages: and indeed, as there is not the ſame vanity of appearing learned in the Saxon as in the Latin and Greek, there is no great fear that thick and ſtick will loſe their k, though they never had it in the original.

401. Ben Jonſon ſays L melteth in the ſounding, and is therefore called a liquid. This, however, cannot be the reaſon that r is called a liquid; for no two letters can, in this reſpect, be more oppoſite. See No. 21.

L is mute in almond, calf, half, calve, halve, chaldron, falcon, folk, yolk (better written yelk with the l ſounded) fuſil, halſer, malmſey, ſalmon, ſalve, talbot (a ſpecies of dog.) See SALVE.

402. L is mute alſo between l and k in the ſame ſyllable, as balk, chalk, talk, ſtalk, walk.

403. L is ſilent likewiſe between a and m in the ſame ſyllable, as alms, balm, calm, palm, pſalm, qualm, ſhalm; but when the m is detached from the l by commencing another ſyllable, the l becomes audible. Thus, though the l is mute in pſalm, it is always heard in pſal-miſt, pſal-mody, and pal-miſtry; but in balmy and palmy, where the y is an adjective termination of our own, no alteration is made in the ſound of the ſubſtantive which ſinks the l, (386). Calmer and calmeſt ought to have the l mute, as they are only degrees of compariſon; and palmer and palmerworm (except in the language of ſcripture, where the l in palmer-worm ought to be heard) are only a ſort of verbal nouns, which never alter the ſound of the original word, and therefore ought to have the l mute. But though l is ſometimes mute in the noun ſalve, and in the verb to ſalve, it is always heard in ſalver (a kind of plate). See the word SALVE.

404. L ought always to be ſuppreſſed in the auxiliary verbs would, could, ſhould: it is ſometimes ſuppreſſed in fault; but this ſuppreſſion is become vulgar, (ſee the word). In ſoldier, likewiſe, the l is ſometimes ſuppreſſed, and the word pronounced ſo-jer; but this is far from being the moſt correct pronunciation: l ought always to be heard in this word, and its compounds ſoldierly, ſoldierſhip, &c.

405. L, preceded by a mute, and followed by e, in a final ſyllable, has an imperfect ſound, which does not do much honour to our language. The l, in this ſituation, is neither ſounded like el nor le, but the e final is ſuppreſſed, and the preceding mute articulates the l, without either a preceding or a ſucceeding vowel; ſo that this ſound may be called a monſter in Grammar—a ſyllable without a vowel. This will eaſily be perceived in the words able, table, circle, &c. which are pronounced as if written abl, tabl, circl, &c. and in thoſe ſtill more Gothick and uncouth abbreviated participial terminations, peopled, bridled, ſaddled, triſles, gaffles, &c. pronounced pee-pl'd, bri-dl'd, ſad-dl'd, tri-flz, gaf-flz, &c. (359).

406. This letter has not only, like f and s, the privilege of doubling itſelf at the end of a word, but it has an excluſive privilege of being double where they remain ſingle; though by what right cannot well be conceived. Thus, according to the general rule, when a verb ends in a ſingle conſonant, preceded by a ſingle vowel, and the accent is on the laſt ſyllable, the conſonant is doubled when a participial termination is added, as, abet, abetting, beg, begging, begin, beginning, &c. but when the accent is not on the laſt ſyllable of the verb, the conſonant remains ſingle, as ſuffered, ſuffering, benefiting, &c. but the l is doubled, whether the accent be on the laſt ſyllable or not, as duelling, levelling, victualling, travelling, traveller, &c. This groſs irregularity, however, would not have been taken notice of in this place, if it had not ſuggeſted an abſurdity in pronunciation, occaſioned by the omiſſion of l. Though the double l is uſeleſs in traveller, victualler, &c. it is not ſo in controller: for as ll is a mark of the deep broad ſound of a in ball, tall, all, &c. (84); ſo the ſame letters are the ſign of the long open ſound of o in boll (a round ſtalk of a plant) to joll, noll (the head), knoll (a little hill), poll, clodpoll, roll, ſcroll, droll, troll, ſtroll, toll: for which reaſon, leaving out one l in bethral, catcal, miſcal, overfal, foreſtal, reinſtal, downfal, withal, control, and unrol, as we find them in Johnſon's Dictionary, is an omiſſion of the utmoſt importance to the ſound of the words; for as the pronunciation ſometimes alters the ſpelling, ſo the ſpelling ſometimes alters the pronunciation. Accordingly we find ſome ſpeakers, chiefly the natives of Ireland, inclined to give the a its middle ſound, to words commencing with al, followed by another conſonant, becauſe they do not ſee the ll in the all with which theſe words are compounded. Thus we ſometimes hear Almighty, albeit, ſo pronounced as to make their firſt ſyllable rhyme with the firſt of al-ley, val-ly; and extol is pronounced by the Scotch ſo as to rhyme with coal; and with juſt as much reaſon as we pronounce control in the ſame manner. For though compounds may, in ſome caſes, be allowed to drop ſuch letters of their ſimples, as either are not neceſſary to the ſound, as in Chriſtmas; or might poſſibly lead to a wrong one, as in Reconcileable (which ſee); yet where, by omitting a letter, the ſound may be altered, the omiſſion is pernicious and abſurd, (84). The ſame obſervations might be extended to the numerous termination full, where, in compounds, one l is omitted, though nothing can be more certain, than that ful, with a ſingle l, has not the ſame ſound as when this letter is doubled: but this abbreviation is too inveterate and extenſive to afford any hope, that the great arbiters of orthography, the printers, will ever ſubmit to the additional trouble of putting another l.

M.

407. M preſerves its ſound in every word, except comptroller; compt and accompt are now univerſally written as they are pronounced count and account; and though m and p are preſerved to the eye in the officer called a comptroller, the word is pronounced exactly like the noun controller, one who controls.

N.

408. N has two ſounds; the one ſimple and pure, as in man, net, &c.; the other compounded and mixed, as in hang, thank, &c. The latter ſound is heard when it is followed by the ſharp or flat guttural mutes, g hard, or k; or its repreſentatives, c hard, qu or x; but it may be obſerved, that ſo prone is our language to the flat mutes, that when n is followed by k, or its repreſentatives—the flat mute g ſeems interpoſed between them. Thus thank, banquet, anxious, are pronounced as if written, not than-k, ban-quet, an-xious, but, thangk, bangquet, angkſhus. But this coalition of the ſound of n and g, or hard c, is only when the accent is on them; for when the g or hard c articulates the accented ſyllable, the n becomes pure. Thus, though congreſs and congregate are pronounced as if written cong-greſs and cong-gregate, yet the firſt ſyllable of congratulate and congreſſive ought to be pronounced without the ringing ſound of n, and exactly like the ſame ſyllable in contrary. The ſame difference may be obſerved in the words concourſe and concur; the firſt word, which has the accent on the firſt ſyllable, is pronounced as if written cong-courſe; and the laſt, which has the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, with n pure. It muſt however be carefully obſerved, that the ſecondary accent has the ſame power of melting the n into the ſucceeding hard g or c as the primary, (522). Thus congregation and concremation have the firſt ſyllable pronounced as if written cong.

409. It may, perhaps, be worthy of notice, that when n is followed by k, the k has a finiſhed or complete ſound, as in link, think, &c. but when n is followed by hard g, the g has an unfiniſhed or imperfect ſound, as in hang, hang, &c. where we may obſerve the tongue to reſt upon the palate in the ſound of g; but when this letter is carried off to articulate another ſyllable, its ſound is completed, as in anger and Bangor (the name of a town), where the ſound of g may be perceived to be very different from the noun hanger (a ſword), and banger (one who beats or bangs). This perfect ſound of g is heard in all ſimples, as anger, angle, finger, linger, conger, anguiſh, languiſh, diſtinguiſh, extinguiſh, unguent: but in words derived from verbs or adjectives, ending in ng, the g continues imperfect, as it was in the theme. Thus a finger (one who fings), does not finiſh the g like finger, but is merely er added to fing: the ſame may be obſerved of fing-ing, bring-ing, and hang-ing. So adjectives formed by the addition of y have the imperfect ſound of g, as in the original word. Thus ſpringy, ſtringy, and wingy, are only the ſound of e added to ſpring, ſtring, and wing; but the comparative and ſuperlative adjectives, longer, ſtronger, and younger; longeſt, ſtrongeſt, and youngeſt; have the g hard and perfectly ſounded, as if written long-ger, ſtrong-ger, young ger, &c. where the g is hard, as in finger, linger, &c. And it may be looked upon as a general rule, that nouns, adjectives, or verbs, do not alter their original ſound upon taking an additional ſyllable. In theſe three words, therefore, the Iriſh pronounce more agreeably to analogy than the Engliſh; for, if I miſtake not, they do not articulate the g, (381).

410. Hitherto we have conſidered theſe letters as they are heard under the accent; but when they are unaccented in the participial termination ing, they are frequently a cauſe of embarraſſment to ſpeakers who deſire to pronounce correctly. We are told, even by teachers of Engliſh, that ing, in the word ſinging, bringing, and ſwinging, muſt be pronounced with the ringing ſound, which is heard when the accent is on theſe letters, in king, ſing, and wing, and not as if written without the g, as ſingin, bringin, ſwingin. No one can be a greater advocate than I am for the ſtricteſt adherence to orthography, as long as the public pronunciation pays the leaſt attention to it; but when I find letters given up by the public, with reſpect to ſound, I then conſider them as cyphers; and, if my obſervation does not greatly fail me, I can aſſert, that our beſt ſpeakers do not invariably pronounce the participial ing, ſo as to rhyme with ſing, king, and ring. Indeed, a very obvious exception ſeems to offer itſelf in thoſe verbs that end in theſe letters, as a repetition of the ringing ſound in ſucceſſive ſyllables would produce a Tautophony, (ſee the word), and have a very bad effect on the ear; and therefore, inſtead of ſinging, bringing, and ſlinging, our beſt ſpeakers are heard to pronounce ſing-in, bring-in, and ſling-in; and for the very ſame reaſon that we exclude the ringing ſound in theſe words, we ought to admit it when the verb ends with in; for if, inſtead of ſinning, pinning, and beginninn, we ſhould pronounce ſin-nin, pin-nin, and begin-nin, we ſhould fall into the ſame diſguſting repetition as in the former caſe. The participial ing, therefore, ought always to have its ringing ſound, except in thoſe words formed from verbs in this termination; for writing, reading, and ſpeaking, are certainly preferable to writin, readin, and ſpeakin, wherever the pronunciation has the leaſt degree of preciſion or ſolemnity.

411. N is mute when it ends a ſyllable, and is preceded by l or m, as kiln, hymn, limn, ſolemn, column, autumn, condemn, contemn. In hym-ning and lim-ning the n is generally pronounced, and ſometimes, in very ſolemn ſpeaking, in condem-ning and contem-ning; but, in both caſes, contrary to analogy, which forbids any ſound in the participle that was not in the verb, (381).

P.

412. This letter is mute before ſ and t at the beginning of words, as pſalm, pſalmiſt, pſalmody, pſalmography, pſalter, pſaltery; the prefix pſeudo, ſignifying falſe, as pſeudography, pſeudology, and the interjection pſhaw! To theſe we may add ptiſan, ptyaliſm, ptyſmagogue. It is mute in the middle of words between m and t, in empty, ſempſtreſs, peremptory, ſumptuous, preſumptuous, redemption, exemption and raſpberry. In cupboard, it coaleſces with, and falls into its flat ſound b, as if written cubboard. It is mute in a final ſyllable between the ſame letters, as tempt, attempt, contempt, exempt, prompt, accompt. In receipt it is mute between i and t, and in the military corps (a body of troops), both p and s are mute, as cuſtom has acquieſced in the French pronunciation of moſt military terms.

PH.

413. Ph is generally pronounced like f, as in philoſophy, phanton, &c. In nephew and Stephen it has the ſound of v. In diphthong, the ſound of p only is heard; in apophthegm both letters are entirely dropped. The ſame may be obſerved of phthiſis, phthiſic, and phthiſical. In ſapphire the firſt p ſlides into ph, by an accentual coalition of ſimilar letters, very agreeable to analogy. See EXAGGERATE.

Q.

414. Q has always the ſound of k: it is conſtantly followed by u, pronounced like w; and its general ſound is heard in quack, quill, queen, &c. pronounced kwack, kwill, qween, &c. That the u ſubjoined to this letter has really the power of w, may be obſerved in the generality of words where a ſucceeds; for we find the vowel go into the broad ſound in quart, quarrel, quantity, &c. as much as in war, warrant, want, &c. (85). But it muſt be carefully noted, that this broad ſound is only heard under the accent; when the a, preceded by qu, is not accented, it has the ſound of every other accented a in the language, (92). Thus the a in quarter, quarrel, quadrant, &c. becauſe it has the accent, is broad; the ſame may be obſerved when the accent is ſecondary only, (522) (527), as in quadrageſimal, quadriſyllable, &c.; but when the accent is on the ſucceeding ſyllable, as in qua-dratick, qua-drangular, &c. the a goes into the obſcure ſound approaching to the Italian a, (92).

415. As a great number of words, derived from the French, have theſe letters in them, according to our uſual complaiſance for that language, we adopt the French pronunciation: thus in coquet, doquet, etiquette, maſquerade, harlequin, oblique, antique, opaque, pique, piquant, piquet, burleſque, groteſque, caſque, moſque, quadrille, quater-couſin, the qu is pronounced like k. Quoif and quoit ought to be written and pronounced coif, coit. Paquet, laquey, chequer, and riſque, have been very properly ſpelled by Johnſon as they are pronounced packet, lackey, checker, and riſk. Quoth ought to be pronounced with the u, as if written kwoth, and therefore is not irregular. Liquor and harlequin always loſe the u; and conquer, conquerable, and conqueror, ſometimes, particularly on the ſtage. This deviation, however, ſeems not to have gone beyond recovery; and conqueſt is ſtill regularly pronounced conkweſt. Quote and quotation are perfectly regular, and ought never to be pronounced as ſome do, cote, and cotation. Cirque, contracted from circus, and cinque, cinque foil, cinque-ports, cinque-ſpotted, are pronounced ſirk and ſink; and critique, when we mean a criticiſm, to diſtinguiſh it from critick, is pronounced criteek, rhyming with ſpeak. See QUOIT and QUOTATION.

416. This letter is never ſilent, but its ſound is ſometimes tranſpoſed. In a final unaccented ſyllable, terminating with re, the r is pronounced after the e, as acre, lucre, ſabre, fibre, ochre, eagre, maugre, ſepulchre, theatre, ſpectre, metre, petre, mitre, nitre, antre, luſtre, accoutre, maſſacre; to which we may add, centre and ſceptre; ſometimes written center and ſcepter; but, in my opinion, very improperly, as this peculiarity is fixed, and eaſily underſtood; while reducing meagre to meager diſturbs the rule, and adds another anomaly to our pronunciation, by making the g hard before e, (98).

417. The ſame tranſpoſition of r is always perceived in the pronunciation of apron and iron; and often in that of citron and ſaffron, as if written apurn, irun, citurn, ſaffurn: nor do I think the two firſt can be pronounced otherwiſe without a diſagreeable ſtiffneſs; but the two laſt may preſerve the r before the vowel with great propriety. Children and hundred have ſlid into this analogy, when uſed colloquially, but preſerve the r before the e in ſolemn ſpeaking.

418 As this letter is but a jar of the tongue, ſometimes againſt the roof of the mouth, and ſometimes at the orifice of the throat, it is the moſt imperfect of all the conſonants: and, as its formation is ſo indefinite, no wonder, when it is not under the accent, that the vowels which precede it ſhould be ſo indefinite in their ſounds; as we may perceive in the words friar, lier, elixir, nadir, mayor, martyr, which, with reſpect to ſound, might be written friur, liur, elixur, nadur, mayur, martur, (98). Theſe inaccuracies in pronunciation, ſays an ingenious writer, 'we ſeem to have derived from our Saxon anceſtors. Dr. Hicks obſerves in the firſt chapter of his Saxon Grammar, that "Comparativa apud eos (Anglo-ſaxonas) indifferenter exeunt in ar, ær, er, ir, or ur, yr; et Superlativa in aſt, æſt, eſt, iſt, oſt, uſt, yſt; participia præſentis temporis in and, ænd, end, ind, ond, und, ynd; præteriti verò in ad, æd, id, od, ud, yd; pro vario ſcilicet vel ævi vel loci dialecto." 'Upon various other occaſions alſo they uſed two or more vowels and diphthongs indifferently; and this not alway from difference of age or place, becauſe theſe variations are frequently found in the ſame page. This will account for the difference between the ſpelling and pronunciation of ſuch anomalous words as buſy and bury, now pronounced as if written biſy and bery (the i and e having their common ſhort ſound), and formerly ſpelt indifferently with e, u, or y.' Eſſay on the Harmony of Language. Robſ. 1774.

419. There is a diſtinction in the ſound of this letter, ſcarce'y ever noticed by any of our writers on the ſubject, which is, in my opinion, of no ſmall importance; and that is, the rough and ſmooth r. Ben Jonſon in his Grammar ſays it is ſounded firm in the beginning of words, and more liquid in the middle and ends, as in rarer, riper; and ſo in the Latin. The rough r is formed by jarring the tip of the tongue againſt the roof of the mouth near the fore teeth: the ſmooth r is a vibration of the lower part of the tongue, near the root, againſt the inward region of the palate, near the entrance of the throat. This latter r is that which marks the pronunciation of England, and the former that of Ireland. In England, and particularly in London, the r in lard, bard, card, regard, &c. is pronounced ſo much in the throat as to be little more than the middle or Italian a, lengthened into baa, baad, caad, regaad; while in Ireland the r, in theſe words, is pronounced with ſo ſtrong a jar of the tongue againſt the fore-part of the palate, and accompanied with ſuch an aſpiration or ſtrong breathing at the beginning of the letter, as to produce that harſhneſs we call the Iriſh accent. But if this letter is too forcibly pronounced in Ireland, it is often too feebly ſounded in England, and particularly in London, where it is ſometimes entirely ſunk; and it may, perhaps, be worthy obſervation, that, provided we avoid a too forcible pronunciation of the r, when it ends a word, or is followed by a conſonant in the ſame ſyllable, we may give as much force as we pleaſe to this letter at the beginning of a word, without producing any harſhneſs to the ear. Thus, Rome, river, rage, may have the r as forcible as in Ireland; but bar, bard, card, hard, &c. muſt have it nearly as ſoft as in London.

420. As the former letter was a jar, this is a hiſs; but a hiſs, which forms a much more definite and compleat conſonant than the other. This conſonant, like the other mutes, has a ſharp and a flat ſound; the ſharp ſound is heard in the name of the letter, and in the words ſame, ſin, this; the flat ſound is that of z, heard in is, his, was: and theſe two ſounds, accompanied by the aſpirate, or h, form all the varieties found under this letter, (41).

421. S has always its ſharp hiſſing ſound at the beginning of words, as ſoon, ſin, &c. and when it immediately follows any of the ſharp mutes, f, k, p, t, as ſcoffs, blocks, hips, pits, or when it is added to the mute e after any of theſe letters, as ſtrifes, ſtakes, pipes, mites.

422. S is ſharp and hiſſing at the end of the monoſyllables yes, this, us, thus, gas: and at the end of words of two or more ſyllables, if it be preceded by any of the vowels but e, and forms a diſtinct ſyllable. Thus es in pipes and mites do not form a diſtinct ſyllable; and as they are preceded by a ſharp mute, the s is ſharp likewiſe; but in prices theſe letters form a ſyllable, and the s is pronounced like z, according to the general rule.

423. The only exception to this rule is, the words as, whereas, has, his, was; for bias, dowlas, Atlas, metropolis, baſis, chaos, tripos, pus, chorus, cyprus, &c. have the final s pronounced ſharp and hiſſing.

424. Agreeably to this rule, the numerous terminations in ous, as pious, ſuperfluous, &c. have the s ſharp, and are pronounced exactly like the pronoun us; and every double s in the language is pronounced in the ſame manner, except in the words diſſolve, poſſeſs, and their compounds; ſciſſors, huſſy, and huſſar.

425. S in the inſeparable prepoſition dis, when either the primary or ſecondary accent is on it, (522), is always pronounced ſharp and hiſſing. The word diſmal, which ſeems to be an exception, is not ſo in reality; for, in this word, dis is not a prepoſition: thus diſſolute, diſſonant, &c. with the primary accent on dis; and diſability, diſagree, &c. with the ſecondary accent on the ſame letters, have the s ſharp and hiſſing; but when the accent is on the ſecond ſyllable, the s is either ſharp or flat, as it is followed either by a vowel, or a ſharp or flat conſonant: thus diſable, diſaſter, diſeaſe, diſintereſted, diſhoneſt, diſorder, diſuſe, have all of them the s in dis flat like z, becauſe the accent is not on it, and a vowel begins the next ſyllable; but diſcredit, diſfavour, diſkindneſs, diſpenſe, diſtaſte, have the s ſharp and hiſſing, becauſe a ſharp conſonant begins the ſucceeding accented ſyllable; and diſband, diſdain, diſgrace, disjoin, diſvalue, have the s flat like z, becauſe they are ſucceeded by a flat conſonant in the ſame ſituation, (435).

426. S in the inſeparable prepoſition mis is always ſharp and hiſſing, whether the accent be on it or not; or whether it be followed either by a vowel, or a ſharp or flat conſonant, as miſcreant, miſaim, miſapply, miſorder, miſuſe, miſbegot, miſdeem, miſgovern, &c. See MIS.

427. S, followed by e in the final ſyllable of adjectives, is always ſharp and hiſſing, as baſe, obeſe, preciſe, conciſe, globoſe, verboſe, morboſe, pulicoſe, tenebricoſe, corticoſe, jocoſe, oleoſe, rugoſe, deſidioſe, cloſe, ſiliculoſe, calculoſe, tumuloſe, animoſe, venenoſe, arenoſe, ſiliginoſe, crinoſe, looſe, operoſe, moroſe, edematoſe, comatoſe, acetoſe, aquoſe, ſiliquoſe, actuoſe, diffuſe, profuſe, occluſe, recluſe, abſtruſe, obtuſe, except wiſe and otherguiſe.

428. S, in the adjective termination ſive, is always ſharp and hiſſing, as ſuaſive, perſuaſive, aſſuaſive, diſſuaſive, adheſive, cohéſive, deciſive, preciſive, inciſive, deriſive, cicatriſive, viſive, plauſive, abuſive, diffuſive, infuſive, incluſive, concluſive, excluſive, eluſive, deluſive, preluſive, alluſive, illuſive, colluſive, amuſive, obtruſive, &c.

429. S, in the adjectives ending in ſory, is always ſharp and hiſſing, as ſuaſory, perſuaſory, diciſory, deriſory, deluſory, &c.

430. The ſame may be obſerved of s in the adjectives ending in ſome, as troubleſome, &c. and ſubſtantives in oſity, as generoſity, &c.

431. Se, preceded by the liquids l, n, or r, has the s ſharp and hiſſing, as pulſe, appulſe, denſe, tenſe, intenſe, ſenſe, verſe, adverſe, &c. except cleanſe.

S pronounced like z.

432. S has always its flat buzzing ſound, as it may be called, in monoſyllables, when it immediately follows any of the flat mutes b, d, g hard, or v, as ribs, heads, rags, ſieves, (24).

433. S is pronounced like z, when it forms an additional ſyllable with e before it, in the plurals of nouns, and the third perſon ſingular of verbs; even though the ſingulars and firſt perſons end in ſharp hiſſing ſounds, as aſſes, riches, cages, boxes, &c. Thus prices and prizes have both the final s flat, though the preceding mute in the firſt word is ſharp, (422).

434. As s is hiſſing, when preceded by a liquid, and followed by e mute, as tranſe, tenſe, &c.; ſo when it follows any of the liquids without the e, it is pronounced like z, as morals, means, ſeems, hers. In the ſame analogy, when s comes before any of the liquids, it has the ſound of z, as Coſmo, coſmetic, diſmal, piſmire, chaſm, priſm, theiſm, ſchiſm, and all polyſyllables ending in aſm, iſm, oſm, or yſm, as enthuſiaſm, judaiſm, microcoſm, paroxyſm, &c.

435. S, in the prepoſition dis, is either ſharp or flat, as it is accented or unaccented, as explained above; but it ought always to be pronounced like z, when it is not under the accent, and is followed by a flat mute, a liquid, or a vowel, as diſable, diſeaſe, diſorder, diſuſe, diſband, diſdain, diſgrace, diſvalue, disjoin, diſlike, diſlodge, diſmay, diſmember, diſmount, diſmiſs, diſnatured, diſrank, diſreliſh, diſrobe, (425). Mr. Sheridan, and thoſe orthöepiſts who have copied him, ſeem to have totally overlooked this tendency in the liquids to convert the s to z when this letter ends the firſt ſyllable without the accent, and the liquids begin the ſecond ſyllable with it.

436. S is pronounced like z, in the monoſyllables is, his, was, theſe, thoſe, and in all plurals whoſe ſingulars end in a vowel, followed by e mute, as commas, operas, ſhoes, aloes, dues, and conſequently when it follows the w or y, in the plurals of nouns, or the third perſon ſingular of verbs, as ways, betrays, news, views, &c.

437. Some verbs ending in ſe have the s like z, to diſtinguiſh them from nouns or adjectives of the ſame form. Examples:

Nouns	Verbs	Nouns	Verbs
grease	to grease	excuse	to excuse
close	to close	refuse	to refuse
houſe	to houſe	diffuſe	to diffuſe
mouſe	to mouſe	uſe	to uſe
louſe	to louſe	riſe	to riſe
abuſe	to abuſe	premiſe	to premiſe

438. Sy and ſey, at the end of words, have the s pronounced like z, if it has a vowel before it, with the accent on it, as eaſy, greaſy, queaſy, cheeſy, daiſy, miſy, roſy, cauſey, noiſy; but if the accent is on the antepenultimate ſyllable, the s is ſharp, as hereſy, poeſy, &c.; if a ſharp mute precede, the s is ſharp, as trikſy, tipſy; if a liquid precede, and the accent is on the penultimate ſyllable, the s is flat, as palſy, flimſy, clumſy, panſy, tanſy, phrenſy, quinſy, tolſey, whimſey, malmſey, jerſey, kerſey. Purſey has the s ſharp and hiſſing from its relation to purſe, and minſtrelſey and controverſy have the antepenultimate and preantepenultimate accent. Thus we ſee why buſy, bouſy, louſy, and drouſy, have the s like z, and jealouſy the ſharp hiſſing s.

439. S, in the termination ſible, when preceded by a vowel, is pronounced like z, as perſuaſible, riſible, viſible, diviſible, infuſible, concluſible; but if a liquid conſonant precede the s, the s then becomes ſharp and hiſſing, as ſenſible, reſponſible, tenſible, reverſible, &c.

440. S, in the terminations ſary and ſory, is ſharp and hiſſing, as diſpenſary, adverſary, ſuaſory, perſuaſory, deciſory, inciſory, deriſory, depulſory, compulſory, incenſory, compenſory, ſuſpenſory, ſenſory, reſponſory, curſory, diſcurſory, luſory, eluſory, deluſory, illuſory, colluſory. Roſary and miſery, which have the s like z, are the only exceptions.

441. S, in the termination iſe, is pronounced like z, except in the adjectives before mentioned, and a few ſubſtantives, ſuch as paradiſe, aniſe, riſe, griſe, verdigriſe, mortiſe, traviſ.

442. S, in the terminations ſal and ſel, when preceded by a vowel, is pronounced like z, as naſal, ouſel, houſel, nouſel, repriſal, propoſal, refuſal, and ſharp and hiſſing when preceded by a conſonant, as menſal, univerſal, &c.

443. S, in the terminations ſion, ſion, and ſion, is pronounced like z, as reaſon, ſeaſon, treaſon, cargaſon, diapaſon, oriſon, beniſon, veniſon, deniſon, uniſon, foiſon, poiſon, priſon, damſon, crimſon, choſen, reſin, roſin, raiſin, couſin. But the s in maſon, baſon, garriſon, capariſon, compariſon, parſon, and perſon, is ſharp and hiſſing, (170).

444. S, after the inſeparable prepoſitions pre and pro, is ſharp, as in preſage, preſide, preſidial, preſcance, preſenſion, proſecute, proſecution, proſody, proſopopeia, but flat like z in preſence, preſident, preſidency, preſume, preſumptive, preſumption; but where the pre is prefixed to a word, which is ſignificant when alone, the s is always ſharp, as preſuppoſe, preſurmiſe, &c.

445. S, after the inſeparable prepoſition re, is almoſt always pronounced like z, as reſemble, reſent, reſentment, reſerve, reſervation, reſervoir, reſidue, reſident, reſidentiary, reſide, reſign, reſignment, reſignation, reſilience, reſiliency, reſilition, reſin, reſiſt, reſiſtance, reſolve, reſolution, reſolute, reſult, reſume, reſumption, reſurrection.

446. S is ſharp after re in reſuſcitation, reſupination, &c. and when the word added to it is ſignificant by itſelf, as reſearch, reſiege, reſeat, reſurvey. Thus to reſign, with the s like z, ſignifies to yield up; but to reſign, to ſign again, has the s ſharp, as in ſign: ſo to reſound, to revertsate, has the s like z; but to resound, to sound again, has the s sharp and hissing.

447. Thus we see, after pursuing this letter through all its combinations, how difficult it often is to decide by analogy, when we are to pronounce it sharp and hissing, and when flat like z. In many cases it is of no great importance: in others, it is the distinctive mark of a vulgar or a polite pronunciation. Thus design is never heard with the s like z but among the lowest order of the people; and yet there is not the least reason from analogy why we should not pronounce it in this manner, as well as in resign: the same may be observed of preside and desist, which have the s sharp and hissing; and reside and resist, where the same letter is pronounced like z. It may, however, be remarked, that re has the s like z after it more regularly than any other of the prefixes.

448. It may, perhaps, be worthy of observation, that though s becomes sharp or flat, as it is followed by a sharp or flat consonant, or a liquid, as cosmetic, dismal, disband, disturb, &c. yet if it follows a liquid or a flat consonant, except in the same syllable, it is generally sharp. Thus the s in tubs, suds, &c. is like z; but in subserve, subside, subsist, it is sharp and hissing; and though it is flat in absolve, it is sharp in absolute and absolution; but if a sharp consonant precede, the s is always sharp and hissing, as tipsy, tricksy. Thus, in the pronunciation of the word Glasgow, as the s is always sharp and hissing, we find the g invariably slide into its sharp sound k; and this word is always heard as if written Glaskow. We see, therefore, that a preceding sharp consonant makes the succeeding s sharp, but not inversely.

449. S is always sharp and hissing when followed by c, except in the word discern.

S aspirated, or sounding like sh, or zh.

450. S, like its fellow dental t, becomes aspirated, and goes into the sharp sound sh, or the flat sound zh, when the accent is on the preceding vowel, and it is followed by a semi-consonant diphthong, as nauseate, or a diphthongal vowel, as pleasure, pronounced nausheate and plezhure (195).

451. S, in the termination sion, preceded by a vowel, goes into the flat aspiration zh, as evasion, cohesion, decision, confusion, pronounced evazhion, &c. but when it is preceded by a liquid, or another s, it has the sharp aspiration sh, as expulsion, dimension, reversion, pronounced expulshion, &c.

452. The same may be observed of s before u; when a vowel precedes the s, with the accent on it, the s goes into the flat aspiration, as pleasure, measure, treasure, rasure, pronounced plezhure, &c. but when preceded by a liquid, or another s, it is sounded sh, is sensual, censure, tonsure, pressure, pronounced censhure, &c.

453. From the clearness of this analogy, we may perceive the impropriety of pronouncing Asia with the sharp aspiration, as if written Ashia; when, by the foregoing rule, it ought undoubtedly to be pronounced Azhia, rhyming with Arpasia, euthanasia, &c. with the flat aspiration of z. This is the Scotch pronunciation of this word, and unquestionably the true one: but if I mikake not, Persia is pronounced in Scotland with the same aspiration of s, and as if written Perzhia; which is as contrary to analogy as the other is agreeable to it.

454. The tendency of the s to aspiration before a diphthongal sound has produced several anomalies in the language, which can only be detected by recurring to first principles: for which purpose it may be necessary to observe, that the accent or stress naturally preserves the letters in their true sound; and as feebleness naturally succeeds force, so the letters, immediately after the stress, have a tendency to slide into different sounds, which require less exertion of the organs. Hence the omission of one of the vowels in the pronunciation of the last syllable of fountain, mountain, captain, &c. (208); hence the short sound of i in respite, servile, &c. hence the s pronounced like z in disable, where the accent is on the second syllable; and like s sharp and hissing in disability, where there is a secondary stress on the first syllable; and hence the difference between the x in exercise, and that in exert; the former having the accent on it, being pronounced cks, as if the word were written ecksercise; and the latter without the accent, pronounced gz, as if the word were written egzert. This analogy leads us immediately to discover the irregularity of sure, sugar, and their compounds, which are pronounced shure and shugar, though the accent is on the first syllable, and ought to preserve the s without aspiration; and a want of attending to this analogy has betrayed Mr. Sheridan into a series of mistakes in the sound of s in the words suiside, presume, resume, &c. as if written shoo-icide, pre-zhoom, re-zhoom, &c. but if this is the true pronunciation of these words, it may be asked, why is not suit, suitable, pursue, &c. to be pronounced shoot, shoot-able, pur-shoo, &c.? If it be answered, custom, I own this decides the question at once. Let us only be assured, that the best speakers pronounce a like o, and that is the true pronunciation: but those who see analogy so openly violated, ought to be assured of the certainty of the custom before they break through all the laws of language to conform to it, (69) (71). See SUPERABLE.

455. We have seen, in a great variety of instances, the versatility of s, how frequently it slides into the sound of z; but my observation greatly fails me if it ever takes the aspiration, unless it immediately follows the accent, except in the words sure, sugar, and their compounds; and these irregularities are sufficient without adding to the numerous catalogue we have already seen under this letter.

456. The analogy we have just been observing directs us in the pronunciation of usury, usurer, and usurious. The two first have the accent on the first syllable, which permits the s to go into aspiration, as if the words were written uzhury, and uzhurer; but the accent being on the ſecond u in the laſt word, the s is prevented from going into aſpiration, and is pronounced uzurious, (479) (480).

457. Though the ſs in paſſion, miſſion, &c. belong to ſeparate ſyllables, as if ſpelt pas-ſion, mis-ſion, &c. yet the accent preſſes the firſt into the ſame aſpiration as the laſt, and they are both pronounced with the ſharp aſpirated hiſs, as if there were but one s. See EXAGGERATE.

458. S is ſilent in iſle, iſland, aiſle, demeſne, puiſne, viſcount, and at the end of ſome words from the French, as glacis, pas, ſous, vis-à-vis; and in corps the two laſt letters are ſilent, and the word pronounced core, (412).

459. T is the ſharp ſound of D, (41); but though the latter is often changed into the former, the former never goes into the latter. The ſound to which this letter is prone is that of s. This ſound, the t was anciently accuſed of uſurping in the Greek language, and this uſurpation has been continued through moſt modern tongues. That p and b, t and d, k and g hard, s and z, ſhould ſlide into each other, is not ſurpriſing, as they are diſtinguiſhed only by a nice ſhade of ſound; but that t ſhould alter to s ſeems a moſt violent tranſition, till we conſider the organic formation of theſe letters, and of thoſe vowels which always occaſion it. If we attend to the formation of t, we ſhall find that it is a ſtoppage of the breath by the application of the upper part of the tongue near the end, to the correſpondent part of the palate; and that if we juſt detach the tongue from the palate, ſufficiently to let the breath paſs, a hiſs is produced which forms the letter s. Now the vowel that occaſions this tranſition of t to s is the ſqueezed ſound of e, as heard in y conſonant, (8): which ſqueezed ſound is a ſpecies of hiſs; and this hiſs, from the abſence of accent, eaſily ſlides into the s, and s as eaſily into ſh. Thus mechanically is generated that hiſſing termination tion, which forms but one ſyllable, as if written ſhun, (195).

460. But it muſt be carefully remarked, that this hiſſing ſound, contracted by the t before certain diphthongs, is never heard but immediately after the accent: when the accent falls on the vowel immediately after the t, this letter, like s or c in the ſame ſituation, preſerves its ſimple ſound. Thus the c in ſocial goes into ſh, becauſe the accent is on the preceding vowel; but it preſerves the ſimple ſound of s in ſociety, becauſe the accent is on the ſucceeding vowel. The ſame analogy is obvious in ſatiate and ſatiety; and is perfectly agreeable to that difference made by accent in the ſound of other letters, (71). See SATIETY.

461. As the diphthongs ia, ie, io, or iu, when coming after the accent, have the power of drawing the t into ſh, ſo the diphthongal vowel u, in the ſame ſituation, has a ſimilar power. If we analyſe the u, we ſhall find it commence with the ſqueezed ſound of e, equivalent to the conſonant y. This letter produces the ſmall hiſs before taken notice of, and which may be obſerved in the pronunciation of nature, and borders ſo cloſely on natſhur, that it is no wonder Mr. Sheridan adopted this latter mode of ſpelling the word to expreſs its ſound. The only fault of Mr. Sheri-dan in depicting the ſound of this word, ſeems to be that of making the u ſhort, as in bur, cur, &c. as every correct ear muſt perceive an elegance in lengthening the ſound of the u, and a vulgarity in ſhortening it. The true pronunciation ſeems to lie between both.

462. But Mr. Sheridan's greateſt fault ſeems to lie in not attending to the nature and influence of the accent; and becauſe nature, creature, feature, fortune, misfortune, &c. have the t pronounced like ch, or tſh, as if written crea-chure, fea-tſhure, &c. he has extended this change of t into tch, or tſh, to the word tune, and its compounds, tutor, tutoreſs, tutorage, tutelage, tutelar, tutelary, &c. tumult, tumour, &c. which he ſpells tſhoon, tſhoon-eble, &c. tſhoo-tur, tſhoo-triſs, tſhoo-tur-idzh; tſhoo-tel-idzh, tſhoo-tel-er, tſhoo-tel-er-y, &c. tſhoo-mult, tſhoo-mur, &c. Though it is evident, from the foregoing obſervations, that as the u is under the accent, the preceding t is preſerved pure, and that the words ought to be pronounced as if written tewtor, tewmult, tewmour, &c. and neither tſhootur, tſhoomult, tſhoomour, as Mr. Sheridan wites them, nor tootor, toomult, toomour, as they are often pronounced by vulgar ſpeakers. See SUPERABLE.

463. Here, then, the line is drawn by analogy. Whenever t comes before theſe vowels, and the accent immediately follows it, the t preſerves its ſimple ſound, as in Miltiades, elephantiaſis, ſatiety, &c.; but when the accent precedes the t, it then goes into ſh, tch, or tſh, as na-tſhure, na-ſhion, vir-tſhue, pa-tient, &c. or natchure, naſhion, virtchue, paſhent, &c. (464). In ſimilar circumſtances, the ſame may be obſerved of d, as arduous, hideous, &c. (293) (294) (376).

464. This pronunciation of t extends to every word where the diphthong or diphthongal ſound commences with i or e, except in the terminations of verbs and adjectives, which preſerve the ſimple in the augment, without ſuffering the t to go into the hiſſing ſound, as I pity, thou pitieſt, he pities, or pitied, mightier, worthier, twentieth, thirtieth, &c. This is agreeable to the general rule, which forbids the adjectives or verbal terminations to alter the ſound of the primitive verb or noun. See No. 381. But in the words beſtial, celeſtial, frontier, admixtion, &c. where the s or n precedes the t, this letter is pronounced like tch inſtead of ſh, (291), as bes-tchial, celes-tchial, fron-tcheer, admix-tchion, &c.; as alſo when the t is followed by eou, whatever letter precede, as righteous, piteous, plenteous, &c. pronounced righ-tcheous, pit-cheous, plen-tcheous, &c. The ſame may be obſerved of t when ſucceeded by uou, as unctuous, preſumptuous, &c. pronounced ung-tchuous, prezumptchuous, &c. See the words.

TH.

465. This liſping ſound, as it may be called, is almoſt peculiar to the Engliſh, (41) (50) (469). The Greek Θ was certainly not the ſound we give it: like its principal letter, it has a ſharp and a flat ſound; but theſe are ſo little ſubject to rule, that a catalogue will, perhaps, be the beſt guide.

466. Th, at the beginning of words, is ſharp, as in thank, think, &c. except in the following words: This, that, than, the, thee, their, them, then, thence, there, theſe, they, thine, thither, thoſe, thou, though, thus, thy, and their compounds.

467. Th, at the end of words, is ſharp, as death, breath, &c. except in beneath, booth, with: and the verbs to wreath, to loath, to uncloath, to ſeeth, to ſmooth, to ſooth, to mouth: all which ought to be written with the e final; not only to diſtinguiſh them from the nouns, but to ſhow that th is ſoft; for though th, when final, is ſometimes pronounced ſoft, as in to loath, to mouth, &c. yet the final is never pronounced hard. There is as obvious an analogy for this ſound of the th in theſe verbs, as for the z ſound of s in verbs ending in ſe, (437), and why we ſhould write ſome verbs with e, and others without it, is inconceivable. The beſt way to ſhow the abſurdity of our orthography in this particular, will be to draw out the nouns and verbs as they ſtand in Johnſon's Dictionary.

Adjectives and Nouns.	Verbs.
wreath,	to wreath, to inwreathe.
loath,	to loathe.
cloth,	to cloathe, to uncloath.
bath,	to bathe.
ſmooth,	to ſmooth.
mouth,	to mouth.
ſwath,	to ſwathe.

Surely nothing can be more evident than the analogy of the language in this caſe. Is it not abſurd to heſitate a moment at writing all the verbs with the e final? This is a departure from our great lexicographer, which he himſelf would approve, as nothing but inadvertency could have led him into this unmeaning irregularity.

468. Th is hard in the middle of words, either when it precedes, or follows a conſonant, as panther, nepenthe, orthodox, arthography, orthoëpy, thwart, athwart, ethnic, miſanthrope, philanthropy, &c. except brethren, farthing, farther, northern, worthy, burthen, murther, where the th is flat; but the two laſt words are better written burden and murder.

469. Th between two vowels is generally ſoft in words purely Engliſh, as father, feather, heathen, hither, thither, whither, whether, either, neither, weather, wether, wither, gather, together, pother, mother.

470. Th between two vowels, in words from the learned languages, is generally hard, as apathy, ſympathy, antipathy, Athens, atheiſt, authentic, author, authority, athirſt, cathartic, cathedral, catholic, catheter, ether, ethics, lethargy, Lethe, leviathan, litharge, lithotomy, Lutheran, matheſis, mathematics, method, pathetic, plethora, polymathy, prothonotary, anathema, amethyſt, theatre, amphitheatre, apothecary, apotheoſis.

471. Th is ſometimes pronounced like ſimple t, as Thomas, thyme, Thames, aſthma, phthiſis, phthiſic, phtiſical, and is ſilent in twelfthtide, pronounced twelftide.

T ſilent.

472. T is ſilent when preceded by s, and followed by the abbreviated terminations en and le, as haſten, chaſten, faſten, liſten, gliſten, chriſten, moiſten, which are pronounced as if written hace'n, chace'n, &c.; in burſten the t is heard: ſo caſtle, neſtle, treſtle, wreſtle, thiſtle, whiſtle, epiſtle, briſtle, griſtle, joſtle, apoſtle, throſtle, buſtle, juſtle, ruſtle, are pronounced as if written caſſle, neſſle, &c. in peſtle the t is pronounced; in often, faſten, and ſoften, the t is ſilent, and at the end of ſeveral words from the French, as trait, gout (taſte), eclat. In the firſt of theſe words the t begins to be pronounced; in the laſt, it has been ſometimes heard; but in the ſecond, never. Toupet is more frequently written toupee, and is therefore not irregular. In billet-doux the t is ſilent, as well as in hauthoy. The ſame ſilence of t may be obſerved in the Engliſh words, Chriſtmas, chetſnut, mortgage, oſtler, bankruptcy, and in the ſecond ſyllable of miſtletoe. In currant and currants the t is always mute.

V.

473. V is flat f, and bears the ſame relation to it as b does to p, d to t, hard g to k, and z to s, (41). It is never irregular; and if ever ſilent, it is in the word twelvemonth, where both that letter and the e are, in colloquial pronunciation, generally dropped, as if written twel'month.

W initial.

474. That w at the beginning of a word is a conſonant, has been proved already, (9) (59). It is always ſilent before r, as in wrack, wrangle, wrap, wrath, wreak, wreath, wreck, wren, wrench, wreſt, wreſtle, wretch, wriggle, wright, wring, wrinkle, wriſt, write, writhe, wrong, wrought, wry, awry, bewray; and before h and the vowel o, when long, as whole, who, &c. pronounced hole, hoo, &c.

475. W before h is pronounced as if it were after the h, as hoo-y why, hoo-en, when, &c. but in whole, whoop, &c. the ſingle and double o coaleſcing with the ſame ſound in w, this laſt letter is ſcarcely perceptible. In ſwoon, however, this letter is always heard; and pronouncing it ſoon, is vulgar. In ſword and anſwer, it is always ſilent. In two it mingles with its kindred ſound, and the number two is pronounced like the abverb too. The ſame may be obſerved of toward and towards, where the w is dropped, as if written toard and toards, rhyming with hoard and hoards, but in the adjectives and adverbs toward and towardly, froward and frowardly, the w is heard diſtinctly. It is ſometimes dropped in the laſt ſyllable of awkward, as if written awkard; but this pronunciation is vulgar.

X.

476. X is a letter compoſed of thoſe which have been already conſidered, and therefore will need but little diſcuſſion, (48) (51). It is flat or ſharp like its component letters, and is ſubject to the ſame laws.

477. X has a ſharp ſound like ks, when it ends a ſyllable with the accent upon it, as exerciſe, excellence, &c. or when the accent is on the next ſyllable, if it begin with a conſonant, as excuſe, expence, &c. (71).

478. X has its flat ſound like gz, when the accent is not on it, and the following ſyllable begins with a vowel, as exert, example, exiſt, &c. pronounced egzert, egzample, egziſt, &c. The ſame ſound may be obſerved if h follow, as in exhibit, exhale, &c. pronounced egzhibit, egzhale; but if the ſecondary accent be on the x in the polyſyllables exhibition, exhalation, &c. this letter is then ſharp, as in exerciſe, (71).

479. X, like s, is aſpirated only when the accent is before it: hence the difference between luxury and luxurious, anxious and anxiety: in the true pronunciation of which words, nothing will direct us but recurring to firſt principles. It was obſerved that s is never aſpirated, or pronounced like ſh, but when the accent is on the preceding ſyllable, (450); and that when the accent is on the ſucceeding vowel, though the s frequently is pronounced like z, it is never ſounded zh; from which premiſes we may conclude, that luxury and luxurious ought to be pronounced luckſhury, and lugzurious, and not lug-zho-ryus, as Mr. Sheridan ſpells it. The ſame error runs through his pronunciation of all the compounds, luxuriance, luxuriant, luxuriate, &c. which unqueſtionably ought to be pronounced lug-zu-ri-ance, lug-zu-ri-ant, lug-zu-ri-ate, &c. in four ſyllables, and not in three only, as they are divided in his Dictionary.

480. The ſame principle will lead us to decide in the words anxious and anxiety: as the accent is before the x in the firſt word, it is naturally diviſible into ank-ſious, and as naturally pronounced ank-ſhus; but as the accent is after the x in the ſecond word, and the hiſſing ſound cannot be aſpirated, (456), it muſt neceſſarily be pronounced ang-ziety. But Mr. Sheridan, without any regard to the component letters of theſe words, or the different poſition of the accent, has not only ſpelled them without aſpiration, but without letting the s, in the compoſition of the laſt word, go into z; for thus they ſtand in his Dictionary: ank-ſyus, ank-ſi-e-ty, (456).

481. The letter x, at the beginning of words, goes into z, as Xerxes, Xenophon, &c. pronounced Zerkſes, Zenophon, &c. it is ſilent at the end of the French word billet-doux, and pronounced like s in beaux; often and better written beaus.

Y initial.

482. Y, as a conſonant, has always the ſame ſound; and this has been ſufficiently deſcribed in aſcertaining its real character; when it is a vowel at the end of a word or ſyllable with the accent upon it, it is ſounded exactly like the firſt ſound of i, as cy-der, tyrant, rèply, &c.; but at the end of a word or ſyllable, without the accent, it is pronounced like the firſt ſound of e, liberty, fury, tenderly, &c.

Z.

483. Z is the flat s, and bears the ſame relation to it as b does to p, d to t, hard g to k, and v to f. Its common name is izzard, which Dr. Johnſon explains into s hard; if, however, this be the meaning, it is a groſs miſnomer; for the z is not the hard, but the ſoft s:* but as it has a leſs ſharp, and therefore not ſo audible a ſound, it is not impoſſible but it may mean s surd. Zed, borrowed from the French, is the more faſhionable name of this letter; but, in my opinion, not to be admitted, becauſe the names of the letters ought to have no diverſity.

484. Z, like s, goes into aſpiration before a diphthong, or a diphthongal vowel after the accent, as is heard in vizier, glazier, grazier, &c. pronounced vizh-i-er, glazh-i-er, grazh-i-er, &c. The ſame may be obſerved of azure, razure, &c.

485. Z is ſilent in the French word rendezvous; and is pronounced in the Italian manner, as if t were before it, in mezzotinto, as if written metzotinto.

Thus have we endeavoured to exhibit a juſt idea of the principles of pronunciation, both with reſpect to ſingle letters, and their various combinations into ſyllables and words. The attentive reader muſt have obſerved how much the ſounds of the letters vary, as they are differently aſſociated, and how much the pronunciation of theſe aſſociations depends upon the poſition of the accent. This is a point of the utmoſt importance, and a want of attending to it has betrayed ſeveral ingenious men into the groſſeſt abſurdities. This will more fully appear in the obſervations on accent; which is the next point to be conſidered.

* Profeſſor Ward, ſpeaking of the reaſon for doubling the s at the end of words, ſays, "s doubled retains its proper force, "which, when ſingle at the end of words, is ſoftened into z, as "his, hiſs." And Dr. Wallis tells us, that it is almoſt certain when a noun has s hard in the laſt ſyllable, and becomes a verb; that in the latter caſe the s becomes ſoft, as a houſe is pronounced with the hard s, and to houſe with the s ſoft.

OF THE NATURE OF ACCENT.

486. THE accent of the ancients is the opprobrium of moderm criticiſm. Nothing can ſhow more evidently the fallibility of the human faculties than the total ignorance we are in at preſent of the nature of the Latin and Greek accent. This would be ſtill more ſurpriſing if a phenomenon of a ſimilar kind did not daily preſent itſelf to our view. The accent of the Engliſh language, which is conſtantly ſounding in our ears, and every moment open to inveſtigation, ſeems as much a myſtery as that accent which is removed almoſt two thouſand years from our view. Obſcurity, perplexity, and confuſion, run through every writer on the ſubject, and nothing could be ſo hopeleſs as an attempt to explain it, did not a circumſtance preſent itſelf, which at once accounts for the confuſion, and affords a clew to lead us out of it.

487. Not one writer on accent has given us ſuch a definition of the voice, as acquaints us with its eſſential properties. They ſpeak of high and low, loud and ſoft, quick and ſlow; but they never once mention that ſtriking property which diſtinguiſhes ſinging from ſpeaking ſounds, and which, from its ſliding from high to low, and from low to high, may not improperly be called the inflection of the voice. No wonder, when writers left this out of the account, that they ſhould blunder about the nature of accent: it was impoſſible they ſhould do otherwiſe; ſo partial an idea of the ſpeaking voice muſt neceſſarily lead them into inextricable difficulties. But let us once divide the voice into its riſing and falling inflection, the obſcurity vaniſhes; and accent becomes as intelligible as any other part of language.

488. Keeping this diſtinction in view, let us compare the accented ſyllable with others, and we ſhall find this general concluſion may be drawn: "The accented ſyllable "is always louder than the reſt; but when it has the "riſing inflection, it is higher than the preceding, and "lower than the ſucceeding ſyllable; and when it has "the falling inflection, it is pronounced higher as well "as louder than the other ſyllables, either preceding or "ſucceeding." The only exception to this rule is, "when the accent is on the laſt ſyllable of a word which "has no emphaſis, and which is the concluding word of a "diſcourſe." Thoſe who wiſh to ſee this clearly demonſtrated muſt conſult Elements of Elocution, vol. ii. p. 5. On the preſent occaſion it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that the ſtreſs we call accent is as well underſtood as is neceſſary for the pronunciation of ſingle words, which is the object of this treatiſe; and therefore, without diſturbing the common opinion concerning accent, we ſhall proceed to make ſome remarks on its proper poſition in a word, and endeavour to detect ſome errors in the uſe and application of it.

The different Poſitions of the Engliſh Accent.

489. Accent, in its very nature, implies a compariſon with other ſyllables leſs forcible; hence we may conclude, that monoſyllables, properly ſpeaking, have no accent: when they are combined with other monoſyllables and form a phraſe, the ſtreſs which is laid upon one, in preference to others, is called emphaſis. As emphaſis evidently points out the moſt ſignificant word in a ſentence, ſo, where other reaſons do not forbid, the accent always dwells with greateſt force on that part of the word which, from its importance, the hearer has always the greateſt occaſion to obſerve; and this is neceſſarily the root, or body of the word. But as harmony of termination frequently attracts the accent from the root to the branches of words, ſo the firſt and moſt natural law of accentuation ſeems to operate leſs in fixing the ſtreſs than any of the other. Our own Saxon terminations, indeed, with perfect uniformity, leave the principal part of the word in quiet poſſeſſion of what ſeems its lawful property, (501); but Latin and Greek terminations, of which our language is full, aſſume a right of preſerving their original accent, and ſubject many of the words they beſtow upon us, to their own claſſical laws. But it may be obſerved in paſſing, that when we adopt a Latin word into our language, and cut off a ſyllable at the end, we generally place the accent two ſyllables higher than in the original word, (503). See ACADEMY.

490. Accent, therefore, ſeems to be regulated, in a great meaſure, by etymology. In words from the Saxon, the accent is generally on the root; in words from the learned languages, it is generally on the termination; and if to theſe we add the different accent we lay on ſome words, to diſtinguiſh them from others, we ſeem to have the three great principles of accentuation; namely, the radical, the terminational, and the diſtinctive.

Accent on Diſſyllables.

491. Every word of two ſyllables has neceſſarily one of them accented, and but one. It is true, for the ſake of emphaſis, we ſometimes lay an equal ſtreſs upon two ſucceſſive ſyllable, as di-rect, ſome-times; but when theſe words are pronounced alone, they have never more than one accent. For want of attending to this diſtinction, ſome writers have roundly aſſerted, that many diſſyllables have two accents, ſuch as convoy, concourſe, diſcord, ſhipwreck: in which, and ſimilar inſtances, they confound the diſtinctneſs, with which the latter ſyllables are neceſſarily pronounced, with accentual force; though nothing can be more different. Let us pronounce the laſt ſyllable of the noun torment as diſtinctly as we pleaſe, it will ſtill be very different with reſpect to force, from the ſame ſyllable in the verb to torment, where the accent is on it; and if we do but carefully watch our pronunciation, the ſame difference will appear in every word of two ſyllables throughout the language. The word Amen is the only word which is pronounced with two conſecutive accents when alone.

492. There is a peculiarity of accentuation in certain words of two ſyllables, which are both nouns and verbs, that is not unworthy of notice; the former having the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and the latter on the laſt. This ſeems an inſtinctive effort in the language (if the expreſſion will be allowed me) to compenſate in ſome meaſure for the want of different terminations for theſe different parts of ſpeech. The words which admit of this diverſity of accent are the following:

493. To this analogy, ſome ſpeakers are endeavouring to reduce the word contents; which, when it ſignifies the matter contained in a book, is often heard with the accent on the firſt ſyllable; but though this pronunciation ſerves to diſtinguiſh words which are different in ſignification, and to give, in ſome meaſure, a difference of form to the noun and verb, in which our tongue is remarkably deficient, ſtill it is doubtful whether this diſtinction be of any real advantage to the language. See BOWL. This diverſity of accentuation ſeems to have place in compoun verbs. See COUNTERBALANCE.

494. Sometimes words have a different accent, as they are adjectives or ſubſtantives.

495. Sometimes the ſame parts of ſpeech have the accent on different ſyllables, to mark a difference of ſignification.

to cónjure, to practiſe magic	to conjúre, to ſummon in a ſacred name
désert, a wilderneſs	desért, merit
búffet, a blow	buffét, a cupboard

496. In this analogy ſome ſpeakers pronounce the word Concordance with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, when it ſignifies a dictionary of the Bible; and with the accent on the ſecond, when it ſignifies agreement: but beſides that there is not the ſame reaſon for diſtinguiſhing nouns from each other, as there is nouns from verbs; the accent on the firſt ſyllable of the word Concordance gives a harſhneſs and poverty to its ſound, which ought to be avoided.

495. But though the different accentuation of nouns and verbs of the ſame form does not extend ſo far as might be expected, it is certain, that in words of two ſyllables, where the noun and verb are of different forms, there is an evident tendency in the language to place the accent upon the firſt ſyllable of the noun, and on the laſt of the verb. Hence the nouns outrage, upſtart, and uproar, have the accent on the firſt ſyllable; and the verbs to uplift, to uphold, and to outſtrip, on the laſt.

498. This analogy will appear ſtill more evident if we attend to the accent of thoſe nouns and verbs which are compounded of two words. Every diſſyllable compounded of words which, taken ſeparately, have a meaning, may be deemed a qualified ſubſtantive; and that word, which qualifies or deſcribes the other, is that which moſt diſtinguiſhes it, and conſequently is that which ought to have the accent. Accordingly we find that inkhorn, outrage, chairman, freehold, ſand-box, book-caſe, pen-knife, have the accent on the firſt ſyllable, which is the ſpecifying part of the word; while gainſay, foreſee, overlook, underſell, have the accent on the laſt ſyllable, which is the leaſt diſtinguiſhing part of the word. This rule, however, is, either by the caprice of cuſtom, or the love of harmony, frequently violated, but is ſufficiently extenſive to mark the general tendency of the language.

Akenſide brings the verb to comment under this analogy:

" ——————— The ſober zeal
" Of age, commenting on prodigious things."
Pleaſures of the Imagination.

And Milton in the ſame manner the verb to commerce;

" And looks commercing with the ſkies,
" Thy rapt ſoul ſitting in thine eyes." Il Penſeroſo.

499. Something very analogous to this we find in the nouns we verbalize, by changing the s ſharp of the noun into the s flat, or z of the verb (437), as a uſe, and to uſe; where we may remark, that when the word in both parts of ſpeech is a monoſyllable, and ſo not under the laws of accent, the verb, however, claims the privilege of lengthening the ſound of the conſonant when it can, as well as when it cannot, prolong the accentuation. Thus we not only find graſs altered to graze, braſs to braze, glaſs to glaze, price to prize, breath to breathe, &c. but the c or s ſharp altered to the s flat in advice to adviſe, excuſe to excuſe, device to deviſe, &c. The noun adopting the ſharp hiſſing ſound, and the verb the ſoft buzzing one, without transferring the accent from one ſyllable to another. The vulgar extend this analogy to the noun practice and the verb to practiſe, pronouncing the firſt with the i ſhort and the c like ſharp s, as if written practiſs, and the laſt with the i long and the s like z, as if writen practize; but correct ſpeakers pronounce the verb like the noun; that is, as if written practiſs. The noun prophecy and the verb to propheſy follow this analogy, only by writing the noun with the c and the verb with the s, and without any difference of ſound, except pronouncing the y in the firſt like e, and in the laſt like i long; where we may ſtill diſcover a trace of the tendency to the barytone pronunciation in the noun, and the oxytone in the verb, (467). See SUPPLEMENT.

500. This ſeems to be the favourite tendency of Engliſh verbs; and where we find it croſſed, it is generally in thoſe formed from nouns, rather than the contrary: agreeably to this, Dr. Johnſon has obſerved, that though nouns have often the accent on the latter, yet verbs have it ſeldom on the former ſyllable; thoſe nouns which, in the common order of language, muſt have preceded the verbs, often tranſmit this accent to the verbs they form, and inverſely. Thus the noun water muſt have preceded the verb to water, as the verb to correſpond muſt have preceded the noun correſpondent; and to purſue muſt claim priority to purſuit. So that we may conclude, wherever verbs deviate from this rule, it is ſeldom by chance, and generally in thoſe words only where a ſuperior law of accent takes place.

Accent on Triſyllables.

501. As words increaſe in ſyllables, the more eaſily is their accent known. Nouns ſometimes acquire a ſyllable by becoming plural; adjectives increaſe a ſyllable by being compared; and verbs, by altering their tenſe, or becoming participles: adjectives become adverbs, by adding ly to them; and prepoſitions precede nouns or verbs without altering the accent of the word to which they are prefixed: ſo that when once the accent of diſſyllables is known, thoſe polyſyllables, whoſe terminations are perfectly Engliſh, have likewiſe their accent invariably ſettled. Thus lion becomes lioneſs; poet, poeteſs; polite becomes politer, or politely, or even politelier; miſchief, miſchievous; happy, happineſs; nay, lioneſs becomes lioneſſes; miſchief, miſchievouſneſs; and ſervice, ſerviceable, ſerviceableneſs, ſerviceably, and unſerviceably, without diſturbing the accent, either on account of the prepoſitive un, or the ſubjunctives able, ably, and ableneſs.

502. Hence we may perceive the glaring abſurdity which prevails even in the firſt circles; that of pronouncing the plural of princeſs, and even the ſingular, with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, like ſucceſs and ſucceſſes; for we might juſt as well ſay, dutchéſs and dutchéſſes, as princéſs and princéſſes; nor would a correct ear be leſs hurt with the latter than with the former.

503. So few verbs of three ſyllables follow the analogy obſervable in thoſe of two, that of protracting the accent to the laſt ſyllable, that this œconomy ſeems peculiar to diſſyllables; many verbs, indeed, of three ſyllables are compounded of a prepoſition of two ſyllables: and then, according to the primary law of accentuation, and not the ſecondary of diſtinction, we may eſteem them radical, and not diſtinctive: ſuch are contradict, intercede, ſuperſede, contraband, circumſcribe, ſuperſcribe, &c. while the generality of words, ending in the verbal terminations iſe and ize, retain the accent of the ſimple as criticiſe, tyranniſe, moderniſe, &c.: and the whole tribe of triſyllable verbs in ate, very few excepted, refuſe the accent on the laſt ſyllable: but words of three ſyllables often take their accent from the learned languages from which they are derived: and this makes it neceſſary to inquire how far Engliſh accent is regulated by that of the Greek and Latin.

On the Influence of the Greek and Latin Accent, on the Accent of Engliſh Polyſyllables.

As our language borrows ſo largely from the learned languages, it is not wonderful that its pronunciation ſhould be in ſome meaſure influenced by them. The rule for placing the Greek accent was, indeed, eſſentially different from that of the Latin; but words from the Greek, coming to us through the Latin, are often ſo much latinized, as to loſe their original accent, and to fall into that of the Latin; and it is the Latin accent which we muſt chiefly regard, as that which influences our own.

The firſt general rule that may be laid down, is, that when words come to us whole from the Greek or Latin, the ſame accent ought to be preſerved as in the original. Thus horizon, ſonorous, decorum, dictator, gladiator, mediator, delator, ſpectator, adulator, &c. preſerve the penultimate accent of the original; and yet the antepenultimate tendency of our language has placed the accent on the firſt ſyllable of orator, ſenator, auditor, cicatrix, plethora, &c. in oppoſition to the Latin pronunciation of theſe words, and would have infallibly done the ſame by abdomen, bitumen, and acumen, if the learned had not ſtepped in to reſcue theſe claſſical words from the invaſion of the Gothic accent, and to preſerve the ſtreſs inviolably on the ſecond ſyllable. Nor has even the interpoſition of two conſonants been always able to keep the accent from mounting up to the antepenultimate ſyllable, as we may ſee in miniſter, ſiniſter, character, &c.; and this may be ſaid to be the favourite accent of our language.

But notwithſtanding this prevalence of the antepenultimate accent, the general rule ſtill holds good; and more particularly in words a little removed from common uſage, ſuch as terms in the arts and ſciences: theſe are generally of Greek original; but coming to us through the Latin, moſt commonly contract the Latin accent when adopted into our language. This will appear more diſtinctly by a liſt, which may ſerve as a rule for all the reſt: and firſt, let us ſelect ſome where the Greek and Latin accent coincide:

metabăsis,	μετάβασις,	protăsis,	πρότασις,
emphăsis,	ἔμφασις,	metathĕsis,	μετάθεσις,
antispăsis,	αντίσπασις,	epenthĕsis,	επένθεσις,
antithĕsis,	αντίθεσις,	apharĕsis,	αφαιρεσις,

Another liſt will ſhow us where the accent of theſe languages differ:

antanaclāsis,	αντανάκλασις,	hydrophōbia,	ὑδροφοβία,
catachrēsis,	κατάχρησις,	cyclopædia,	κυκλοπαιδεία,
paracentēsis,	παρακέντησις,	aporĭa,	απορία,
aposiopēsis,	αποσιώπησις,	prosopopœia,	προσωποποία,
antiptōsis,	αντίπτωσις,	epiphonēma,	επιφώνημα,
anadiplōsis,	αναδίπλωσις,	diaphorēsis,	διαφόρησις,
auxēsis,	ἄυξησις,	diplōma,	δίπλωμα,
mathēsis,	μάθησις,	paragōge,	παραγωγή,
exegēsis,	ἐξήγησις,	apostrŏphe,	αποστροφή.

In this liſt we perceive the peculiar tendency of the Latin language to accent the long penultimate vowel, and that of the Greek, to pay no regard to it if the laſt vowel is ſhort, but to place the accent on the antepenultimate. It will, however, be eaſily perceived, that in this caſe we follow the Latin analogy.

The next rule we may venture to lay down as a pretty general one, is, that if the words derived from the learned languages, though angliciſed by altering the termination, contain the ſame number of ſyllables as in the original languages, they are generally to be pronounced with the ſame accent: that is, with the ſame accent as the firſt perſon preſent of the indicative mood active voice, or as the preſent participle of the ſame verb.

The reality of this rule will beſt appear by a ſelection of ſuch claſſes of words as have an equal number of ſyllables in both languages.

Words which have a in the penultimate ſyllable:

prevalent,	prævălens,	infamous,	infāmis,
equivalent,	æquivălens,	propagate,	propāgo,
adjacent,	adjăcens,	indagate,	indāgo,
ligament,	ligāmen,	ſuffragan,	ſuffrāgans.

In this ſmall claſs of words we find all but the two firſt have a different accent in Engliſh from that of the Latin. The rule for placing the accent in that language being the ſimpleſt in the world: if the penultimate ſyllable is long, the accent is on it; if ſhort, the accent is on the antepenultimate.

Words which have e in the penultimate ſyllable:

penetrate,	penĕtro,	exuberant,	exubĕrans,
diſcrepant,	discrĕpans,	eminent,	emĭnens,
precedent,	præcēdens,	excellent,	excēllens,
elegant,	elĕgans,	alienate,	alīeno,
exuperant,	exupĕrans,	delegate,	delēgo.

In this claſs we find the penultimate e accented in Engliſh as in Latin, except in the three laſt words. The word alienate departs from the Latin accentuation, by placing the ſtreſs on the firſt ſyllable, as if derived from the Engliſh noun alien. The e in penetro is either long or ſhort in Latin, and in this caſe we generally prefer the ſhort ſound to the long one.

Words which have i in the penultimate ſyllable:

ultimate,	ultĭmus,	efficience,	efficĭens,
proximate,	proxĭmus,	ſufficience,	ſufficĭens,
acclivous,	acclīvus,	perſpicience,	perſpicĭens,
declivous,	declīvus,	conſcience,	conſcĭens,
proclivous,	proclīvus,	obedience,	obedĭens,
litigant,	litĭgans,	peſtilence,	peſtĭlens,
mitigant,	mitĭgans,	ſupplicate,	ſupplĭcans,
ſibilant,	sibĭlans,	explicate,	explĭçans,
vigilant,	vigĭlans,	abdicate,	abdĭcans,
fulminant,	fulmĭnans,	providence,	provĭdens,
diſcriminate,	discrimĭno,	feſtinate,	feſtīno,
habitant,	habĭtans,	mendicant,	mendīcans, beneficent,	benefĭcus,	reſident,	reſīdens,
accident,	accĭdens,	diffidence,	diffĭdens,
evident,	evĭdens,	confidence,	confĭdens,
indigent,	indĭgens,	inveſtigate,	inveſtīgo,
diligent,	dilĭgens,	caſtigate,	caſtīgo,
negligent,	negligens,	extricate,	extrīco,
exigence,	exĭgens,	irritate,	irrīto,
intelligence,	intellĭgens,	profligate,	profligo,
deficience,	deficĭens,	inſtigate,	inſtīgo.

In the foregoing liſt of words we find a very general coincidence of the Engliſh and Latin accent, except in the laſt eleven words, where we depart from the Latin accent on the penultimate, and place it on our own favourite ſyllable the antepenultimate. Theſe laſt words muſt therefore be ranked as exceptions.

Words which have o in the penultimate ſyllable:

arrogant,	arrŏgans,	omnipotent,	omnipŏtens,
diſſonant,	diſſŏnans,	innocent,	innŏcens,
redolent,	redŏlens,	deſolate,	deſōlo,
inſolent,	inſŏlens,	decorate,	decōro,
benevolent,	benevŏlus,	elaborate,	elabōro,
condolence,	condŏlens,	laborant,	labōrans,
indolence,	indŏlens,	ignorant,	ignōrans,
armipotent,	armipŏtens,	ſuffocate,	ſuffōco.

In this liſt the difference of the Engliſh and Latin accent is conſiderable. The ſix laſt words deſert the Latin penultimate for the Engliſh antepenultimate accent, and condolence falls into an accentuation diametrically oppoſite.

Words which have u in the penultimate ſyllable:

fabulate,	fabŭlor,	populate,	popŭlo,
maculate,	macŭlo,	ſubjugate,	subjŭgo,
adjuvate,	adjŭvo,	abducent,	abdūcens,
corrugate,	corrŭgo,	relucent,	relūcens,
petulant,	petŭlans,	imprudent,	imprūdens,
diſputant,	diſpŭtans,	adjutant,	adjūtans,
impudent,	impŭdent,	peculate,	pecūlor,
ſpeculate,	ſpecŭlor,	indurate,	indūro,
pullulate,	pullŭlo,	obdurate,	obdūro.

Here we find the general rule obtain, with, perhaps, fewer exceptions than in any other claſs. Adjuvate, peculate, and indurate, are the only abſolute deviations; for obdurate has the accent frequently on the ſecond ſyllable. See the word.

To theſe liſts, perhaps, might be added the Engliſh words ending in tion, ſion, and ity: for though tion and ſion are really pronounced in one ſyllable, they are by almoſt all our orthöepiſts generally divided into two; and conſequently nation, pronunciation, occaſion, evaſion, &c. contain the ſame number of ſyllables as natio, pronunciatio, occaſio, evaſio, &c. and have the accent, in both Engliſh and Latin, on the antepenultimate ſyllable. The ſame may be obſerved of words ending in ity, as diverſity, variety, &c. from diverſitas, varietas, &c.

By this ſelection (which, though not an exact enumeration of every particular inſtance, is yet a ſufficient ſpecimen of the correſpondence of Latin and Engliſh accent) we may perceive that there is a general rule running through both languages reſpecting the accent of polyſyllables, which is, that when a ſingle vowel in the penultimate is followed by a ſingle conſonant, the accent is on the antepenultimate. This is ſo agreeable to Engliſh analogy, that in words deriyed from the Latin, where the penultimate vowel, followed by a ſingle conſonant, is long, and conſequently has the accent, we almoſt always neglect this exception, as it may be called, in the Latin language, and fall into our own general rule of accenting the antepenultimate. Nor is it, perhaps, unworthy of being remarked, that when we neglect the accent of the original, it is almoſt always to place it at leaſt a ſyllable higher; as adjacent and condolence are the only words in the whole ſelection, where the accent of the Engliſh word is placed lower than in the Latin.

There is, indeed, a remarkable coincidence of accent between Latin verbs of three ſyllables, commencing with a prepoſition, and the Engliſh words of two ſyllables, derived from them, by dropping a ſyllable *, as excēllo, rebēllo, inquīro, confīno, confūto, conſūmo, deſīro, explōro, procēdo, proclāmo, have the accent in Latin on the ſecond ſyllable; and the Engliſh verbs excel, rebel, inquire, confine, confute, conſume, deſire, explore, proceed, proclaim, have the accent on the ſame ſyllable. This propenſity of following the Latin accent in theſe words, perhaps, in this, as well as in other caſes, formed a general rule, which, at laſt, neglected the Latin accent, in words of this kind; as we find prefer, confer, defer, deſert, compare, compleat, congeal, divide, diſpute, prepare, have the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, though præfĕro, defĕro, confĕro, deſĕro, compăro, complĕo, congĕlo, divĭdo, diſpŭto, prepăro, have the accent on the firſt: and this propenſity, perhaps, laid the foundation of that diſtinction of accent which is ſo remarkable between diſſyllable nouns and verbs of the ſame form. See No. 492.

But when Engliſh polyſyllables are derived from the Latin by dropping a ſyllable, ſcarcely any analogy is more apparent than the coincidence of the principal accent of the Engliſh word, and the ſecondary accent, (522), we give to the Latin word, in the Engliſh pronunciation of it. Thus parſimony, ceremony, matrimony, melancholy, &c. have the accent on the firſt ſyllable, becauſe, in pronouncing the Latin words, parſimonia, cæremonia, matrimonia, melancholia, &c. we are permitted, and prone in our Engliſh pronunciation of theſe words, to place a ſecondary accent on that ſyllable. See ACADEMY, IRREPARABLE, &c.

With reſpect to the quantity of the antepenultimate ſyllable in polyſyllables, it may be obſerved, that, regardleſs of the quantity of the original, we almoſt, without exception, follow the analogy of our own language. This analogy uniformly ſhortens the vowel, unleſs it be u, followed

* Ben Jonſon ſeems to have had a faint idea of this coincidence, where he ſays, "all verbs coming from the Latin, either "of the ſupine or otherwiſe, hold the accent as it is found in the "firſt perſon preſent of thoſe Latin verbs, as ánimo, ánimate, "célebro, célebrate; except words compounded of facio, as lique- "facio, liquefy; and of ſtatuo, as conſtituto, conſtitūte." Engliſh Grammar. Of the extent and juſtneſs of theſe obſervations, the critical reader will be the beſt judge.

by a ſingle conſonant, or any other vowel followed by a ſingle conſonant, ſucceeded by a ſemi-conſonant diphthong. Thus the firſt u in dūbious is pronounced long, though ſhort in the Latin word dŭbĭus; the ſame may be obſerved of the e and o in mĕdium and empŏrium; and the firſt i in delĭrium, and the firſt e in dĕlicate, are pronounced ſhort in Engliſh according to our own analogy, (507), though theſe letters are long in the Latin delīrium and dēlicatus. For the quantity of Engliſh dyſſyllables derived from the Greek and Latin, ſee No. 542, 543, 544, &c.

Terminational Accent.

504. We have ſeen that the Saxon terminations, regardleſs of harmony, always leave the accent where they found it, let the adventitious ſyllables be ever ſo numerous. The Saxons, attentive chiefly to ſenſe, preſerved the ſame ſimplicity in the accentuation, as in the compoſition of their words; and, if ſenſe were the only object of language, it muſt be confeſſed, that our anceſtors were, in this reſpect, ſuperior to the Greeks and Romans. What method could ſo rigidly preſerve, and ſo ſtrongly convey, the ſenſe of words, as that which always left the accent on the root, where the principal meaning of the word undoubtedly lies? But the neceſſities of human nature require that our thoughts ſhould not only be conveyed with force, but with eaſe; to give language its due effect, it muſt be agreeable as well as forceful; and the ear muſt be addreſſed while we are informing the mind. Here, then, terminational accent, the muſic of language, interpoſes; corrects the diſcordant, and ſtrengthens the feeble ſounds; removes the difficulty of pronunciation which ariſes from placing the accent on initial ſyllables, and brings the force gently down to the latter part of the word, where a cadence is formed, on the principles of harmony and proportion.

505. To form an idea of the influence of termination upon accent, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that words which have ei, ia, ie, io, eou, in their termination, always have the accent on the preceding ſyllable: thus atheiſt, alien, regalia, ambroſia, &c. the numerous terminations in ion, ian, &c. as gradation, promotion, confuſion, logician, phyſician, &c. thoſe in ious, as harmonious, abſtemious, &c. thoſe in eous, as autrageous, advantageous, &c. Theſe may not improperly be ſtyled ſemi-conſonant diphthongs, (196).

506. The only exceptions to this rule are one word in iac, as elegiac, which has the accent on the i, and the following words in iacal, as proſodiacal, cardiacal, heliacal, genethliacal, maniacal, demoniacal, ammoniacal, theriacal, paradiſiacal, aphrodiſiacal, and hypochondriacal; all which have the accent on the antepenultimate i, and that long and open, as in idle, title, &c.

507. Nothing can be more uniform than the poſition of the accent in words of theſe terminations; and, with very few exceptions, the quantity of the accented vowel is as regular as the accent; for when theſe terminations are preceded by a ſingle conſonant, every accented vowel is long, except i; which, in this ſituation, is as uniformly ſhort. Thus occaſion, adheſion, eroſion, and confuſion, have the a, e, o, and u, long; while viſion and deciſion have the i ſhort. The ſame may be obſerved of probation, concretion, devotion, ablution, and exhibition. The exceptions are, impetuous, especial, perpetual, discretion and battalion, which laſt ought to be ſpelt with double l, as in the French, from which it is derived, and then it would follow the general rule. National, and rational, form two more exceptions; and theſe are almoſt the only irregularities to which theſe numerous claſſes of words are ſubject.

508. Nearly the ſame uniformity, both of accent and quantity, we find in words ending in ic. The accent immediately precedes this termination, and every vowel under this accent but u is ſhort. Thus Satanic, pathetic, eliptic, harmonic, &c. have the accent on the penultimate, and the vowel ſhort; while tunic, runic, and cubic, have the accented vowel long.

509. The ſame may be obſerved of words ending in ical, as fanatical, poetical, levitical, canonical, &c. which have the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable, and the vowels a, e, i, and o, ſhort; but cubical and muſical, with the accent on the ſame ſyllable, have the u long.

510. The only exceptions to this rule are, Bucolic, arſenic, choleric, ephemeric, turmeric, emperic, rhetoric, biſhopric (better written biſhoprick, ſee No. 400) lunatic, arithmetic, ſplenetic, heretic, politic, and, perhaps, phlegmatic; which, though more frequently heard with the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable, ought, if poſſible, to be reduced to regularity. Words ending in ſcene have uniformly the accent on the penultimate ſyllable, as quieſcence, reminiſcence, &c.; coneupiſcence, which has the accent on the antepenultimate, is the only exception. This accentuation ſeems to ariſe as much from the correſpondence to the Latin words of the ſame number of ſyllables, as to the concurrence of two conſonants, (503). See SUPPLEMENT.

511. In the ſame manner, if we take a view of the words ending in ity, we find the accent invariably placed on the preceding ſyllable, as in diverſity, congruity, &c. On a cloſer inſpection we find every vowel in this antepenultimate ſyllable, when no conſonant intervenes, pronounced long, as deity, piety, &c. A nearer inſpection ſhows us, that, if a conſonant precede this termination, the preceding accented vowel is ſhort, except it be u, as ſeverity, curioſity, impunity, &c. we find too, that even u contracts itſelf before two conſonants, as in curvity, taciturnity, &c. and that ſcarcity, and rarity (ſignifying uncommonneſs; for rarity, thinneſs, has the a ſhort) are the only exceptions to this rule throughout the language. The ſame obſervations are applicable to words ending in ify, as juſtify, clarify, &c. The only words where the antepenultimate accent in words of this termination does not ſhorten the vowel are, glorify and notify. The y in theſe words is always long, like the firſt ſound of i; and both accent and quantity are the ſame when theſe words take the additional ſyllable able, as juſtifiable, rareſiable, &c. (183).

512. To theſe may be added the numerous claſs of words ending in arous, erous, and orous, as barbarous, meteorus, and humorous; all which have the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable, except canorous and sonorous; which ſome unlucky ſcholar happening to pronounce with the accent on the penultimate ſyllable, in order to ſhow their derivation from the Latin adjectives, canorus and sonorous, they ſtand like ſtrangers amidſt a crowd of ſimilar words, and are ſure to betray a mere Engliſh ſcholar into a wrong pronunciation.

To polyſyllables in theſe terminations might be added thoſe in ative, atory, ctive, &c.; words ending in ative can never have the accent on the penultimate ſyllable, if there is a higher ſyllable to place it on, except in the word creative; and when this is the caſe, as it is ſeldom otherwiſe, the accent ſeems to reſt on the root of the word; or on that ſyllable which has the accent on the noun, adjective or verb with which the word in ative correſponds. Thus copulative, eſtimative, alterative, &c. follow the verbs to copulate, to eſtimate, to alter, &c. When derivation does not operate to fix the accent, a double conſonant will attract it to the antepenultimate ſyllable, as appellative; and two conſonants have ſometimes this power in oppoſition to derivation, as adverſative and argumentative. Indicative and interrogative are likewiſe exceptions, as they do not follow the verbs to indicate and interrogate; but as they are grammatical terms, they ſeem to have taken their accent from the ſecondary accent, we ſometimes give to the Latin words indicativus and interrogativè, (ſee the word ACADEMY). Words ending in ary, ery, or ory, have generally the accent on the root of the word; which, if it conſiſts of three ſyllables, muſt neceſſarily be accented on the firſt, as contrary, treachery, factory, &c.; if of four or five, the accent is generally on that ſyllable which has the accent in the related or kindred words; thus expoſtulatory has the accent on the ſame radical ſyllable as expoſtulate; and congratulatory, as congratulate: interrogatory and derogatory are exceptions here, as in the termination ative; and if * pacificatory, ſacrificatory, ſignificatory, &c. have not the accent on the firſt ſyllable, it ſeems to ariſe from the averſion we ſeem to have at placing even the ſecondary accent on antepenultimate a, (which we ſhould be very apt to do if the principal accent were on the firſt ſyllable), and the difficulty there would be in pronouncing ſuch long words with ſo many unaccented ſyllables at the end, if we were to lay the accent on the firſt. Words ending in ctive have the accent regularly on the penultimate ſyllable, except adjective, which, like indicative, being a grammatical word, ſeems to have taken its accent from the ſecondary ſtreſs of the Latin adjectivus, (ſee ACADEMY); and every word ending in tive, preceded by a conſonant, has the accent on the penultimate ſyllable likewiſe, except ſubſtantive, and, perhaps, for the reaſon juſt given. After all, it muſt be owned, that words ending in ative and atory, are the moſt irregular and deſultory of any in the language; as they are generally accented very far from the end, they are the moſt difficult to pronounce; and therefore whenever uſage will permit, we ſhould incline the ſtreſs as much as poſſible to the latter ſyllables. Thus refractory ought never to have the accent on the firſt ſyllable; but refectory, with the accent on the firſt, is a ſchool term, and, like ſubſtantive, adjective, indicative, and interrogative, muſt be left in quiet poſſeſſion of their Latin ſecondary accent.

* Theſe words ought certainly to be accented alike; and accordingly we find Dr. Johnſon, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Barclay, and Mr. Smith, place the accent on the ſecond ſyllable. but though Fenning accents ſignificatory in the ſame manner, he places the accent on the antepenultimate of pacificatory; and Kenrick likewiſe accents the ſecond ſyllable of ſignificatory, but the firſt of pacificatory: the other orthöepiſts who have not got theſe words have avoided theſe inconſiſtencies.

Enclitical Accent.

513. I have ventured to give the name of enclitical to the accent of certain words, whoſe terminations are formed of ſuch words as ſeem to loſe their own accent, and throw it back on the laſt ſyllable of the word with which they coaleſce, ſuch as theology, orthography, &c. The readineſs with which theſe words take the antepenultimate accent, the agreeable flow of ſound to the ear, and the unity it preſerves in the ſenſe, are ſufficient proofs of the propriety of placing the accent on this ſyllable, if cuſtom were ambiguous. I do not remember to have heard the accent diſputed in any word ending in ology; but orthography is not unfrequently pronounced with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, like orthodoxy. The temptation we are under to diſcover our knowledge of the component parts of words, is very apt to draw us into this pronunciation; but as thoſe words which are derived from the Greek, and are compounded of λόγος, have univerſally given into this enclitical accentuation, no good reaſon appears for preventing a ſimilar pronunciation in thoſe compounded of γραφω, as by placing the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable the word is much more fluent and agreeable to the ear. It is certain, however, that at firſt ſight the moſt plauſible reaſoning in the world ſeems to lie againſt this accentuation. When we place the accent on the firſt ſyllable, ſay our opponents, we give a kind of ſubordinate ſtreſs to the third ſyllable graph: by which means the word is divided into its primitives ορθὸς and γραφω, and thoſe diſtinct ideas it contains, are preſerved, which muſt neceſſarily be confounded by the contrary mode; and that pronunciation of compounds, ſay they, muſt certainly be the beſt which beſt preſerves the import of the ſimples.

514. Nothing can be more ſpecious than this reaſoning, till we look a little higher than language, and conſider its object; we ſhall then diſcover, that in uniting two words under one accent, ſo as to form one compound term, we do but imitate the ſuperior operations of the mind, which, in order to collect and convey knowledge, unite ſeveral ſimple ideas into one complex one. "The end of language," ſays Mr. Locke, "is by ſhort ſounds to ſignify with eaſe "and diſpatch general conceptions, wherein not only abun-"dance of particulars are contained, but alſo a great variety "of independant ideas are collected into one complex one, "and that which holds theſe different parts together in the "unity of one complex idea, is the word we annex to it. "For the connexion between the looſe parts of thoſe com-"plex ideas being made by the mind, this union, which "has no particular foundation in nature, would ceaſe "again, were there not ſomething that did, as it were, "hold it together, and keep the parts from ſcattering; "though, therefore, it be the mind that makes the collec-"tion, 'tis the name which is, as it were, the knot which "ties them faſt together." This reaſoning, with reſpect to words and ideas, is ſo exactly applicable to accent and words, that we need but change the names to have an argument in form. for that accentuation which unites the different parts of a word under one forcible preſſure of the voice; for, as Mr. Locke continues, "Men, in framing "ideas, ſeek more the convenience of language and quick "diſpatch by ſhort and comprehenſive ſigns, than the true "and preciſe nature of things; and, therefore, he who "has made a complex idea of a body with life, ſenſe, and "motion, with a faculty of reaſon joined to it, need but "uſe the ſhort monoſyllable, man, to expreſs all particu-"lars that correſpond to that complex idea." So it may be ſubjoined, that in framing words for the purpoſe of immediate communication, the end of this communication is beſt anſwered by ſuch a pronunciation as unites ſimples into one compound, and at the ſame time renders the compound as much a ſimple as poſſible: but it is evident that this is done by no mode of accentuation, ſo well as that which places the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable of the words theólogy, ortlógraphy; and therefore that this accentuation, without inſiſting on its ſuperior harmony, muſt beſt anſwer the great end of language, (328).

515. This tendency in our language, to ſimplify compounds, is ſufficiently evident in that numerous catalogue of words, where we find the long vowel of the ſimple changed into a ſhort one in the compound, and by this means loſing much of its original import to the ear; thus breakfaſt, ſhepherd, vineyard, meadow, ſhadow, zealous, hearken, valley, cleanſe, cleanly (neat) forehead, wilderneſs, bewilder, kindred, knowledge, darling, fearful, pleaſant, pleaſure, whitſter, whitleather, ſeamſtress, ſtealth, wealth, health, wiſdom, wizard, parentage, lineage, children, paſty, goſling, collier, holiday, Chriſtmas, Michaelmas, windlaſs, cripple, hinder, ſtripling, ſtarling, houſewife, huſband, primer, peascod, fieldfare, birth from bear, dearth from dear, weary from wear, and many others, entirely loſe the ſound of the ſimple in their compound or derivative.

516. The long i in white, when a ſimple, is almoſt univerſally changed into a ſhort one in proper names, as Whitchurch, Whiteſield, Whitbread, Whitlock, Whitaker, &c. for compendiouſneſs and diſpatch being next in importance to perſpicuity, when there is no danger of miſtake, it is no wonder that the organs ſhould fall into the ſhorteſt and eaſieſt ſounds.

517. It muſt, however, be obſerved, that this tendency to unite ſimples into a compound, by placing an accent exactly where the two words coaleſce, is ſtill ſubſervient to the laws of harmony. The Greek word δοκέω, which ſignifies opinion, and from which the laſt ſyllables of orthodoxy are derived, was never a general ſubjunctive word like λογος and γραφω; and even if it had been ſo, the aſſemblage of conſonants in the letter x would have prevented the ear from admitting an accent on the ſyllable immediately preceding, as the x would, by this means, become difficult to pronounce. Placing the accent, therefore, on the firſt ſyllable of orthodoxy, gives the organs an opportunity of laying a ſecondary ſtreſs upon the third, which enables them to pronounce the whole with diſtinctneſs and fluency. Thus Galaxy and Cachexy, having the accent on the firſt ſyllable, are very difficult to pronounce; but this difficulty is removed by placing the accent a ſyllable higher in the words apoplexy, ataraxy, and anorexy. See the words.

518. But the numerous claſſes of words that ſo readily adopt this enclitical accent ſufficiently prove it to be agreeable to the genius of our pronunciation. This will more evidently apppear by adducing examples. Words in the following terminations, have always the accent on that ſyllable where the two parts unite, that is, on the antepenultimate ſyllable.

In logy, as apology, ambilogy, genealogy, &c.
In graphy, as geography, orthography, hiſtoriography, &c.
In phagus, as ſarophagus, ichthyophagus, androphagus, &c.
In loquy, as obloquy, ſoliloquy, ventriloquy, &c.
In ſtrophe, as cataſtrophe, apoſtrophe, anaſtrophe, &c.
In meter, as geometer, barometer, thermometer, &c.
In gonal, as diagonal, octagonal, polygonal, &c.
In vorous, as carnivorous, granivorous, piſcivorous, &c.
In ferous, as bacciferous, cocciferous, ſomniferous, &c.
In fluous, as ſuperfluous, melliſluous, felliſluous, &c.
In fluent, as melliſluent, circumfluent, interfluent, &c.
In vomous, as ignivomous, flammivomous, &c.
In parous, as viviparous, oviparous, deiparous, &c.
In cracy, as theocracy, ariſtocracy, democracy, &c.
In gony, as theogony, coſmogony, hexagony, &c.
In phony, as ſymphony, cacophony, colophony, &c.
In machy, as theomachy, logomachy, ſciomachy, &c.
In nomy, as œconomy, aſtronomy, Deuteronomy, &c.
In tomy, as anatomy, lithotomy, arteriotomy, &c.

In ſcopy, as metopoſcopy, deuteroſcopy, aeroſcopy, &c.
In pathy, as apathy, antipathy, idiopathy, &c.
In mathy, as opſimathy, polymathy, &c. &c. &c.

519. Some of theſe Greek compounds ſeem to refuſe the antepenultimate accent for the ſame reaſon as orthodoxy; ſuch as necromancy, chiromancy, hydromancy; and thoſe terminating in archy, as hierarchy, oligarchy, patriarchy: all of which have the accent on the firſt ſyllable, which gives the organs time to recover their force upon the third, and to pronounce the two conſonants with much more eaſe, than if the accent immediately preceded them; but periphraſis and antiphraſis, beſides their claim to the accent of their originals, readily admit of the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, becauſe the conſonants in the two laſt ſyllables do not come together, and are therefore eaſily pronounced after the accent. Orthöepy having no conſonant in the antepenultimate ſyllable, naturally throws its accent on the firſt.

520. By this view of the enclitical terminations we may eaſily perceive how readily our language falls into the antepenultimate accent, in theſe compounded polyſyllables; and that thoſe terminations which ſeem to refuſe this accent, do it rather from a regard to etymology than analogy. Thus words ending in aſis, as periphraſis, apophaſis, hypoſtaſis, &c. have the antepenultimate accent of their originals. The ſame may be obſerved of thoſe ending in esis, as hypothesis, antithesis, parenthesis, &c. but exegesis, mathesis, auxesis, catachresis, paracentesis, aposiopeſis, have the accent on the penultimate ſyllable, becauſe the vowel in this ſyllable is long in Greek and Latin. But all words ending in osis have the accent on the penultimate, except metamorphosis and apotheosis, which deſert the accent of their Latin originals, while thoſe in ysis are accented regularly on the antepenultimate in Greek, Latin, and Engliſh, as analysis, paralysis, &c. We may note too, that every s in all theſe terminations is ſharp and hiſſing.

521. Words of three ſyllables ending in ator have the accent on the penultimate, as ſpectator, collator, delator, &c. except orator, senator, legator, and barrator. But words in this termination of more than three ſyllables, though they have generally the accent on the penultimate, are ſubject to a diverſity not eaſily reduced to rule: thus navigator, propagator, dedicator, &c. are ſometimes pronouneed with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and ſometimes on the third: but as theſe words may be pronounced with an accent on both theſe ſyllables, it is of leſs conſequence on which ſyllable we place the accent, when we uſe only one. The general rule certainly inclines to the penultimate accent; but as all theſe words are verbal nouns, and, though generally derived from Latin words of the ſame terminations, have verbs correſponding to them in our own language, it is very natural to preſerve the accent of the verb in theſe words, as it gives an emphaſis to the moſt ſignificant part of them: thus equivocator, prevaricator, dedicator, might be regularly formed from the verbs to equivocate, to prevaricate, and to dedicate; and, agreeably to analogy, would have been written equivocater, prevaricater, and dedicater; but an affectation of preferring every analogy to our own, has given theſe words a Latin termination, which anſwers no purpoſe, but to involve our language in abſurdities; but the ear, in this caſe, is not quite ſo ſervile as the eye: and though we are obliged to write theſe words with or, and not er, we generally hear them pronounced as if they were formed from our own verbs, and not from Latin nouns in ator. But when the word has no verb in our own language to correſpond to it, the accent is then placed with great propriety upon the a, as in Latin: thus violator, inſtigator, navigator, &c. ought to have the accent on the firſt ſyllable; and emendator, gladiator, adulator, &c. on the laſt but one.

SECONDARY ACCENT.

522. HITHERTO we have conſidered that accent only, which neceſſarily diſtinguiſhes one ſyllable in a word from the reſt; and which, with very little diverſity, is adopted by all who ſpeak the Engliſh language.

523. The ſecondary accent is that ſtreſs we may occaſionally place upon another ſyllable, beſides that which has the principal accent, in order to pronounce every part of the word more diſtinctly, forcibly, aud harmoniouſly. Thus this accent is on the firſt ſyllable of converſation, commendation, &c.

524. There are few authors who have not taken notice of two accents upon ſome of the longer polyſyllables, but none have once hinted that one of theſe is not eſſential to the ſound of the word: they ſeem to have ſuppoſed both accents equally neceſſary, and without any other difference, than that one was pronounced more forcibly than the other. This miſtake aroſe from a want of ſtudying the ſpeaking voice. A knowledge of this would have told them, that one accent only was eſſential to every word of more than one ſyllable, and that the ſecondary ſtreſs might, or might not, be adopted, as diſtinctneſs, force, or harmony, ſhould require: thus complaiſant, contraband, caravan; and violin, partiſan, artiſan, courtiſan, metaphyſick, have frequently an accent on the firſt, as well as on the laſt ſyllable, though a ſomewhat leſs forcible one. The ſame may be obſerved of repartee, referee, privateer, domineer, &c. but it muſt ſtill be obſerved, that though an accent be allowed on the firſt ſyllable of theſe words, it is by no means neceſſary; they may all be pronounced with one accent, and that on the laſt ſyllable, without the leaſt deviation from propriety.

525. In order to give ſome idea of the nature of the ſecondary accent, let us ſuppoſe, that, in giving our opinion of an argument, we ſay,

"It is a diréct demonſtrátion of the Copernican ſyſtem."

In this ſentence, as an accent is neceſſarily upon the laſt ſyllable of direct, we ſeldom lay a ſtreſs on the firſt ſyllable of demonſtration, unleſs we mean to be uncommonly emphatical. But in the following ſentence,

"It is a démonſtrátion of the Copernican ſyſtem."

Here, as no accented word precedes demonſtration, the voice finds a reſt, and the ear a force, in placing an accent on the firſt, as well as on the third ſyllable of this word.

526. But though we may, or may not, uſe the ſecondary accent at pleaſure, it is by no means a matter of indifference on what ſyllable we place it: this is fixed, with as much certainty as the place of the principal accent itſelf; and a wrong poſition of one, would as much derange the ſound of the word as a wrong poſition of the other: and it muſt be carefully noted, that though we lay no ſtreſs upon the ſyllable which may have the ſecondary accent, the conſonants and vowels have exactly the ſame ſound as if the doubtful ſyllable (as it may be called) were accented. Thus though I lay no ſtreſs upon the ſecond ſyllable of negociation, pronunciation, eccleſiaſtic, &c. the c and s go into the ſound of ſh and zh, as if the ſecondary accent were on the preceding ſyllable, (357) (451) (459).

527. It may be obſerved, in the firſt place, that the ſecondary accent is always two ſyllables, at leaſt, diſtant from the principal accent: thus in demonſtration, lamentation, provocation, &c. the ſecondary accent is on the firſt ſyllable, and the principal on the third; and in arteriotomy, meteorology, and hypochondriacal, the ſecondary accent is on the firſt, and the principal on the fourth ſyllable; and in the word indiviſibility we may place two ſecondary accents, one upon the firſt, and the other on the third ſyllable.

528. In the next place it may be obſerved, that though the ſyllable on which the principal accent is placed, is fixed and certain, yet we may, and do, frequently make the ſecondary principal, and the principal ſecondary: thus caravan, complaiſant, violin, repartee, referee, privateer, domineer, may all have the greateſt ſtreſs on the firſt, and the leaſt on the laſt ſyllable, without any violent offence to the ear: nay, it may be aſſerted, that the principal accent on the firſt ſyllable of theſe words, and none at all on the laſt, though certainly improper, has nothing in it grating or diſcordant; but placing an accent on the ſecond ſyllable of theſe words would entirely derange them, and produce an intolerable harſhneſs and diſſonance. The ſame obſervations may be applied to demonſtration, lamentation, provocation, navigator, propagator, alligator, and every ſimilar word in the language. But, as we have obſerved, the conſonants t, d, c, and s, after the ſecondary accent, are exactly under the ſame predicament as after the primary; that is, if they are followed by a diphthong or diphthongal vowel, theſe conſonants are pronounced like ſh, tſh, zh, or j, as ſententioſity, partiality, &c. (526).

QUANTITY.

529. In treating this part of pronunciation, it will not be neceſſary to enter into the nature of that quantity which conſtitutes poetry; the quantity here conſidered will be that which relates to words taken ſingly; and this is nothing more than the length or ſhortneſs of the vowels, either as they ſtand alone, or as they are differently combined with vowels or conſonants, (63).

530. Quantity, in this point of view, has already been fully conſidered under every vowel and diphthong in the language. What remains to be ſaid on this ſubject is, the quantity of vowels under the ſecondary accent. We have ſeen that vowels under the principal accent, before the diphthongs ia, ie, eou, ion, are all long, except i, (507). That all vowels are long before the terminations ity and ety, (511); that if one conſonant precede theſe terminations, every preceding accented vowel, except the a in ſcarcity, and rarity ſignifying uncommonneſs, is ſhort but u; and that the ſame analogy of quantity is found before the terminations ic and ical, and the numerous enclitical terminations we have juſt been pointing out. Here we find cuſtom conformable to analogy; and that the rules for the accent and quantity of theſe words admit of ſcarcely any exceptions. In other parts of the language where cuſtom is more capricious, we can ſtill diſcover general rules; and there are but very few words in which the quantity of the vowel under the principal accent is not aſcertained. Thoſe who have but a common ſhare of education, and are converſant with the pronunciation of the capital, are ſeldom at a loſs for the quantity of the vowel under that accent which may be called principal; but the ſecondary accent in the longer polyſyllables does not ſeem to decide the quantity of the vowels ſo invariably. Mr. Sheridan divides the words deglutition, depravation, degradation, dereliction, and democratical, into de-glu-ti-tion, de-pra-va-tion, de-gra-dation, de-re-lic-tion, and de-mo-crat-i-cal; while Dr. Kenrick more accurately divides them into deg-lu-tition, dep-ra-va-tion, deg-ra-da-tion, and dem-o-crat-i-cal; but makes not any diſtinction between the firſt o in profanation and profane; prodigality and prodigious; prorogation and prorogue; though he diſtinguiſhes this letter in the firſt ſyllable of progreſs and that in progreſſion. And though Mr. Sheridan divides retrograde into ret-ro-grade, he divides retrogradation, retrogreſſion, retroſpect, retroſpection, and retroſpective, into re-tro-gra-da-tion, re-tro-gres-ſion, re-tro-ſpect, re-tro-ſpec-tion, and re-tro-ſpec-tive. At the fight ſight of theſe words we are tempted to prefer the preposition in a diſtinct ſyllable, as ſuppoſing that mode to convey more diſtinctly each part of the word; but cuſtom at large, the beſt interpreter of nature, ſoon lets us ſee that theſe prepoſitions coaleſce with the word they are prefixed to, for reaſons greatly ſuperior to thoſe which preſent themſelves at firſt, (514). If we obſerve the tendency of pronunciation, with reſpect to inſeparable prepoſitions, we ſhall find, that thoſe compound words which we adopt whole from other languages we conſider as ſimples, and pronounce them without any reſpect to their component parts; but thoſe compounds which we form ourſelves retain the traces of their formation, in the diſtinction which is obſervable, between the prepoſitive and radical part of the word: thus retrogade, retrogreſſion, retroſpect, and retroſpective, coming compounded to us from the Latin, ought, when the accent is on the prepoſition, to ſhorten the vowel, and unite it to the root, as in res-ur-rec-tion, rec-ol-lec-tion, prep-o-ſit-ion, &c. while re-commit, re-convey, &c. being compounds of our own, muſt preſerve it ſeparate.

531. From what has been obſerved ariſes this general rule: where the compound retains the primary ſenſe of the ſimples, and the parts of the word are the ſame in every reſpect, both in and out of compoſition, then the prepoſition is pronounced in a diſtinct ſyllable; but when the compound departs ever ſo little from the literal ſenſe of the ſimples, the ſame departure is obſervable in the pronunciation; hence the different ſyllabication and pronunciation of re-com-mence and rec-om-mend; the former ſignifies a repetition of a commencement, but the latter does not imply a repetition of a commendation: thus re-petition would ſignify to petition again; while rep-etition ſignifies only an iteration of the ſame act, be it what it will. The ſame may be obſerved of the words re-create and rec-reate, re-formation and ref-ormation.

532. That this is perfectly agreeable to the nature of the language, appears from the ſhort pronunciation of the vowel in the firſt ſyllable of preface, prelate, prologue, prelude, &c. as if divided into pref-ace, prel-ate, prol-ogue, prel-ude, &c.; and that it is agreeable to the nature of things, may be collected from obſerving, that the utility of language does not conſiſt in keeping the ſimples in a word ſo diſtinct as that each of the component parts ſhall remain in a ſtate of ſeparation, but in uniting ſeveral parts into one undiſtinguiſhed compound; which compound ſhall often have an idea annexed to it ſomewhat different from the ſimples that compoſe it, (514).

533. It will be neceſſary, however, to obſerve, that in forming a judgement of the propriety of theſe obſervations, the niceſt care muſt be taken not to confound thoſe prepoſitions which are under the primary and ſecondary accent, with thoſe which immediately precede the ſtreſs; for preclude, pretend, &c. are under a very different predicament from prologue, prepoſition, &c.; and the very ſame law that obliges us to pronounce the vowel ſhort in the firſt ſyllable of prov-i-dence, prov-o-cation, and prof-a-nation, obliges us to pronounce the vowel open, and with ſome degree of length in pro-vide, pro-voke, and pro-fane. The ſame may be obſerved of the e in re-pair and rep-a-ration; re-ply and rep-li cation; re-peat and rep-e-tition; the accent making the whole difference between the quantity of the vowel in one word and the other.

534. The only exception to the ſhortening power of the ſecondary accent is the ſame as that which prevents the ſhortening power of the primary accent, (503), namely, the vowel u, as in lucubration, or when any other of the vowels are ſucceeded by a ſemi-conſonant diphthong, (196): thus mediator and mediatorial have the e in the firſt ſyllable as long as in mediate: deviation has the e in the firſt ſyllable as long as in deviate, notwithſtanding the ſecondary accent is on it, and which would infallibly have ſhortened it, if it had not been for the ſucceeding diphthong ia; and even this diphthong in gladiator has not the power of preſerving the firſt ſyllable long; though Mr. Sheridan, by his marking it, ſeems to be of a different opinion.

535. From what has been ſeen of accent and quantity, it is eaſy to perceive how prone our language is to an antepenultimate accent, and how naturally this accent ſhortens the vowel it falls upon: nay, ſo great a propenſity have vowels to ſhrink under this accent, that the diphthong itſelf, in ſome words, and analogy in others, are not ſufficient to prevent it, as valiant, retaliate. Thus, by the ſubjoining only of al to nation, with the a long, it becomes national, with the a ſhort, though contrary to its relation with occaſion and congregation; which do not ſhorten the a upon being made occaſional and congregational: in like manner the acquiſition of the ſame termination to the word nature, makes it nat-u-ral; but this, it may be preſumed, is derived from the Latin naturalis; and not from adding al to the Engliſh word, as in the foregoing inſtances; and thus it comes under the ſhortening power of the antepenultimate accent, notwithſtanding the ſemi-conſonant diphthong u.

536. The ſame ſhortening power in the antepenultimate accent may be obſerved in rational and ratiocinate, where the firſt a in the firſt word, and the o in the ſecond, are ſhort. The firſt a in the ſecond word is ſhort alſo by the power of the ſecondary accent; though Mr. Sheridan has, in my opinion, very erroneouſly divided ratiocination into ra-ſho-ſy-na-ſhun; that is, into a ſyllable leſs than it ought to have, and marked the o long inſtead of ſhort.

537. The accent on the Latin antepenultimate ſeemed to have ſomething of a ſimilar tendency: for though the great difference in the nature of the Latin and Engliſh accent will allow us to argue from one to the other, but in very few circumſtances (503), yet we may perceive in that accent, ſo different from ours in general, a great coincidence in this particular; namely, its tendency to ſhorten an antepenultimate ſyllable. Biſhop Hare tells us, that "Quæ acuuntur in tertia ab extrema, interdum acuta

" corripiunt, ſi poſitione ſola longa ſunt, ut óptime, sérvitus, " pérvelim, Pámphilus, et pauca alia, quo Cretici mutan- " tur, in Anapeſtos. Idem factum eſt in néutiquam, licet " incipiat diphthongo." De Metr. Comic, p. 62.— Thoſe words, which have the acute accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable, have ſometimes that ſyllable ſhortened, if it was only long by poſition, as óptime, sérvitus, pérvelim, Pámphilus, and a few others, which by this means are changed from Cretic to Anapeſtic feet: nay, néutiquam undergoes the ſame fate, though it begin with a diphthong.

SYLLABICATION.

538. Dividing words into ſyllables is a very different operation, according to the different ends propoſed by it. The object of ſyllabication may be, either to enable children to diſcover the ſound of words they are unacquainted with, or to ſhow the etymology of a word, or to exhibit the exact pronunciation of it.

539. When a child has made certain advances in reading, but is ignorant of the ſound of many of the longer words, it may not be improper to lay down the common general rule to him, that a conſonant between two vowels muſt go to the latter; and that two conſonants coming together muſt be divided. Farther than this, it would be abſurd to go with a child; for telling him that compounds muſt be divided into their ſimples, and that ſuch conſonants as may begin a word may begin a ſyllable, requires a previous knowledge of words, which children cannot be ſuppoſed to have; and which, if they have, makes the diviſion of words into ſyllables unneceſſary. Children, therefore, may be very uſefully taught the general rule above mentioned, as, in many caſes, it will lead them to the exact ſound of the word, as in pro-vi-ded; and in others, it will enable them to give a good gueſs at it, as in de-li-cate; and this is all that can be expected. This procedure may be called ſynthetic, as it proceeds from parts to the whole; and when we are to form an unknown compound ſound, out of ſeveral known ſimple ſounds, (which is the caſe with children, when we wiſh them to find out the ſound of a word by ſpelling it); this, I ſay, is the only method that can be taken.

540. But an etymological diviſion of words is a different operation. This ſyllabication, which has etymology for its object, is an analytic diviſion; that is, the diviſion of a perſon acquainted with the whole word, and who wiſhes to convey, by this diviſion, a knowledge of its conſtituent parts, as ortho-graphy, theo-logy, &c.

541. In the ſame manner, a perſon, who is pre-acquainted with the whole compound ſound of a word, and wants to convey the ſound of each part to one unacquainted with it, muſt adopt the analytic method, by dividing it into ſuch partial ſounds as, when put together again, will exactly form the whole, as or-thog-ra-phy, the-ol-o-gy, &c. This is the method adopted by thoſe who would convey the whole ſound, by giving diſtinctly every part; and, when this is the object of ſyllabication, Dr. Lowth's rule is certainly to be followed. " The beſt and eaſieſt rule," ſays the learned biſhop, " for dividing the ſyllables in " ſpelling, is, to divide them as they are naturally divided " in a right pronunciation, without regard to the deriva- " tion of words, or the poſſible combination of conſo- " nants, at the beginning of a ſyllable." Introduction to Eng. Gram. page 7.

542. In this view of ſyllabication we conſider it only as the picture of actual pronunciation; but may we not conſider it as directed likewiſe by ſome laws of its own? Laws, which ariſe out of the very nature of enunciation, and the ſpecific qualities of the letters? Theſe laws certainly direct us to ſeparate double conſonants, and ſuch as are uncombinable from the incoaleſcence of their ſounds: and if ſuch a ſeparation will not paint the true ſound of the word, we may be certain that ſuch ſound is unnatural, and has ariſen from caprice. Thus the words Chamber, Cambridge, and Cambrick, muſt be divided at the letter m, and as this letter, by terminating the ſyllable according to the ſettled rules of pronunciation, ſhortens the vowel—the general pronunciation given to theſe words muſt be abſurd, and contrary to the firſt principles of the language. *Angel, ancient, and manger, are under the ſame predicament; but the paucity of words of this kind, ſo far from weakening the general rule, ſtrengthen it. See CHANGE.

543. By an induction which demonſtrates the ſhortening power of the antepenultimate accent, has been ſhown the propriety of uniting the conſonant to the vowel in the firſt ſyllable of demonſtration, lamentation, propagation, &c. and thus deciding upon the quantity of theſe vowels, which are ſo uncertain in our beſt dictionaries; and may we not hope, by a ſimilar induction, and with the firſt principles of language in view, to decide the true, genuine, and analogical ſound of ſome words of another kind which waver between different pronunciations? The antepenultimate accent has unqueſtionably a ſhortening power; and I have not the ſmalleſt doubt that the penultimate accent has a lengthtening power: that is, if our own words, and words borrowed from other languages of two ſyllables, with but one conſonant in the middle, had been left to the general ear, the accent on the firſt ſyllable would have infallibly lengthened the firſt vowel. A ſtrong preſumption of this ariſes from our pronunciation of all Latin diſſyllables in this manner, without any regard to the quantity of the original, (ſee DRAMA), and the ancient practice of doubling the conſonant when preceded by a ſingle vowel in the participial terminations: and I believe it may be confidently affirmed, that words of two ſyllables from the Latin, with but one conſonant in the middle, would always have had the firſt vowel long, if a pedantic imitation of Latin quantity had not prevented it, (ſee DRAMA). Let an Engliſhman, with only an Engliſh education, be put to pronounce zephyr, and he will, without heſitation, pronounce the e long as in zenith; if you tell him the e is pronounced ſhort in the Latin zephyrus, which makes it ſhort in Engliſh, and he ſhould happen to aſk you the Latin quantity of the firſt ſyllable of comic, mimic, ſolace, &c. your anſwer would be a contradiction to your rule.

544. But the ſmall dependance of the Engliſh quantity on that of the Latin will be beſt ſeen by a ſelection of words of two ſyllables, with the accent on the firſt, and but one conſonant in the middle, and comparing them with the Latin words from which they are derived.

Engliſh diſſyllables which have but one conſonant, or a mute and liquid in the middle, and have the firſt ſyllable pronounced long, with the Latin words from which they are derived, marked with their reſpective quantities.

545. In this view of the Latin and Engliſh quantity, we ſee how uncertain it is to argue from the former to the latter; for though the Latin accent is frequently a rule for placing the Engliſh accent, as in words derived whole from that language, as abdomen, acumen, &c. (503), or preſerving the ſame number of ſyllables, as in impudent, elegant, from impudens, elegans, &c. (503), yet the quantity of the Latin ſeems to have no influence on that of the Engliſh. In words of two ſyllables, where one conſonant comes between two vowels, as focus, baſis, local, &c. though the vowel in the firſt ſyllable is ſhort in Latin, it is long in Engliſh; and inverſely, florid, frigid, livid, &c. have the vowels in the firſt ſyllable ſhort, though theſe vowels are long in floridus, frigidus, lividus, &c.; ſo that if any thing like a rule can be formed, it is, that when a word of three ſyllables in Latin, with the two firſt ſhort, is angliciſed by dropping the laſt ſyllable; we ſhorten the firſt ſyllable of the Engliſh diſſyllable, unleſs it ends with the vowel u, (535). Thus we ſee the ſhortening power of our Engliſh antepenultimate accent, which ſhortens every antepenultimate vowel but u in our pronunciation of Latin words, as in mimicus, vividus, &c. continues its ſhortening power in the penultimate accent of theſe words when angliciſed into mimick and vivid; and hence it is that the ſhort quantity of the firſt vowel in diſſyllables is become ſo prevalent in our language, to the great detriment of its ſound, and the diſturbance of its ſimplicity.

It may be neceſſary in the next place to take a view of ſuch words as are either of Saxon or French original, or not ſo immediately derived from the Latin, as to be influenced by its quantity.

From the peruſal of this ſelection we ſee a great majority of words where the firſt vowel is ſounded ſhort, and therefore, to ſome inſpector, it may ſeem improbable that the original tendency of our Saxon language was to the long quantity of the penultimate vowel. But as Mr. Nares very judiciouſly obſerves, "the rule is ſufficiently general "to be admitted, and is undoubtedly founded in the na- "ture of our pronunciation:" for which he quotes Dr. Wallis, who ſays, "Hæc videtur genuina linguæ noſtræ "ratio antiqua."

546. Thoſe who have made the progreſs of languages their ſtudy, will obſerve, it is preſumed, that the broad ſounds of vowels change to the ſlender *, the difficult conſonants to the eaſier, and the long vowels to ſhort ones. This, it is imagined, will be found to be true in all languages, as well as our own; and ſuch alteration ſeems founded in the nature of man and of ſociety. The next object to underſtanding a language being diſpatch, it is no wonder that ſhort ſounds have been encroaching on us, and depriving us of the tune of our words for the ſake of gaining time. This is apparent in the abbreviation of ſimples when compounded, as in knowledge, ſhepherd, &c. (518): but as it is the buſineſs of art to correct and regulate the excentricities of nature and the exceſſes of cuſtom, it ſhould be the care of every philoſophic grammarian to keep his eye upon the original genius and general ſcope of his language, and to ſuffer cuſtom to depart as little from them as poſſible. But although no inconſiſtency or want of analogy can alter any pronunciation which is once acknowledged and ſettled, yet when a pronunciation is wavering, conſiſtency, analogy, and general principles, ought to decide againſt a great majority of mere faſhion and caprice.

Thus have I endeavoured to give a diſtinct view of the correſpondence between the accent and quantity of the learned languages and our own, and to reſcue a plain Engliſhman, who (as Ben Jonſon ſays of Shakeſpeare, has little Latin and leſs Greek,) from the ſupercilious criticiſm of thoſe Greeklings and Latinitaſters, who are often remarkably ignorant of their own language, and yet frequently decide upon its accent and quantity, becauſe they have a ſmattering of Greek and Latin. If the queſtion turns upon the accent of an Engliſh word, the Latin word it is derived from is immediately produced, and ſentence paſſed without appeal; and yet if the Engliſhman were to aſk the rule on which he ſo peremptorily decides, the ſcholar would, in all probability, be at a loſs to tell him. Has every Engliſh word, he might ſay, the ſame accent as the Latin word from which it is derived? This the ſcholar could not anſwer in the affirmative, as the leaſt recollection would tell him that parſimony, acrimony, &c. cannot be accented after the Latin parſimonia, acrimonia, &c. as the Latin is never accented higher than the antepenultimate. Or is the Engliſh word adopted whole from the Latin? Here is undoubtedly a fair pretence for pronouncing it with the Latin accent; and yet we ſee how many exceptions there are to this rule. Or does the Engliſh word, though angliciſed, retain the ſame number of ſyllables? This, indeed, may be ſaid to be a general rule for preſerving the Latin accent, but ſo general as to be neglected in a thouſand inſtances. But if the ſcholar, as is often the caſe, huddles quantity and accent together, and infers the Engliſh quantity from the Latin; the Engliſh ſcholar needs only refer him to the ſelections here given, to ſhow the inanity of ſuch a plea. Upon the whole, therefore, I flatter myſelf that men of learning will be gratified to ſee the ſubject in a clearer point of view than any in which it has ever been exhibited; and the plain Engliſh ſcholar will be indebted to me for giving him as clear and diſtinct an idea of the connexion between the Greek and Latin accent and quantity, and the accent and quantity of his native tongue, and if he had Homer and Horace by heart, and placing him out of the reach of thoſe pert minor critics, who are conſtantly inſulting him with their knowledge of the dead languages.

Of the Quantity of the unaccented Vowels not united to Conſonants.

547. Accented ſyllables, as we have before obſerved, (179), are the grand outlines of words, and ſo ſtrongly marked as to be eaſily comprehended when they are once ſettled by cuſtom or analogy; but thoſe immediately before or after the accent are in a ſtate of uncertainty, which

* Alioqui, pro uſu, abuſus & inveteratus error nobis obtruderetur. Olim enim pro mutatione ſonorum mutabantur & litteræ: & ſi quando conſuetudo aliquid mutaſſet, ſcribendi quoque modus ſtatim variabatur. Unde quum apud Ennium & Plautum Soni & Servos diceretur & ſcriberetur, poſteà multis aurium delicijs o vocali rejecta, quod vaſtus illius videretur ſonus, u littera ſubſtituta eſt, & ſono expreſſa; ita ut eorum loco Sunt & Servus prolatum & ſcriptum ſit. Adolphi Mekerchi Brugenſis De Veteri et Recta Pronunciatione Linguæ Græcæ Commentarius.

ſome of our beſt judges find themſelves unable to remove. Some grammarians have called all the open vowels before or after the accent ſhort, though the ear ſo evidently dictates the contrary in the u in utility, the o in obedience, &c. Some have ſaved themſelves the trouble of farther ſearch by comprehending theſe vowels under the epithet obſcure. Nay, ſo unfixed do the ſounds of theſe vowels ſeem, that a lexicographer, whoſe Rhetorical Dictionary ſhows he is poſſeſſed of very great philological abilities, ſeems as much at a loſs about them as the meaneſt grammarian in the kingdom: for when he comes to mark the ſound of the vowel o in the firſt ſyllable of a ſeries of words with the accent on the ſecond, he makes the o in promulge, propel, and prolix, long, as they ought to be; and the ſame letter in proboſcis, proceed, and procedure, ſhort. Dominion, domeſtic, donation, and domain, are marked as if pronounced dom-inion, dom-eſtic, don-ation, and dom-ain, with the o ſhort; while the firſt of docility, potential, and monotony, have the o marked long, as in donor, potent, and modiſh; though it is certain to a demonſtration, that the etymology, accent, and letters, being the ſame, the ſame ſound muſt be produced, unleſs where cuſtom has preciſely marked a difference; and that the firſt ſyllables of promulge, propel, and prolix, and thoſe of proboſcis, proceed, and procedure, have no ſuch difference, ſeems too evident to need proof *.

548. I known it may be demanded with great plauſibility, how do I know that there is not this very inconſiſtency in cuſtom itſelf? What right have I to ſuppoſe that cuſtom is not as vague and capricious in theſe ſyllables as in thoſe under the accent. To which I anſwer—if cuſtom has determined the ſound of theſe vowels, the diſpute is at an end. I implicitly acquieſce in the deciſion; but if profeſſors of the art diſagree in their opinions, it is a ſhrewd ſign that cuſtom is not altogether ſo clear in its ſentence; and I muſt inſiſt on recurring to principles till cuſtom has unequivocally decided.

549. Every vowel that is neither ſhortened by the accent, nor ſucceeded by a double conſonant, naturally terminates a ſyllable; and this terminating vowel, though not ſo properly long as if the accent were on it, would be very improperly termed ſhort, if by ſhort, as is often the caſe, be meant ſhut, (65). According to this idea of ſyllabication, it is preſumed that the word opinion would fall into three diſtinct parts, and every part be terminated by a conſonant but the firſt, thus o-pin-ion.

550. But it may be demanded, what reaſon is there in the nature of the thing for dividing the word in this manner rather than into op-in-ion, where a conſonant ends every ſyllable? In this, as in many other caſes of delicacy, we may be allowed to prove what is right, by firſt proving what is wrong. Every ear would be hurt, if the firſt ſyllable of opinion and opulence were pronounced exactly alike, op-in-ion would be as different from o-pin-ion as o-pu-lence from op-u-lence, and conſequently a different ſyllabication ought to be adopted; but as opulence is rightly divided into op-u-lence, opinion muſt be divided into o-pin-ion; that is, the o muſt be neceſſarily ſeparated from the p, as in o-pen; for as was before obſerved, every vowel pronounced alone has its open ſound, as nothing but its junction with a conſonant can ſhut it, and conſequently unaccented vowels not neceſſarily joined to a conſonant are always open; therefore, without violating the fundamental laws of pronunciation, opinion muſt neceſſarily be divided into o-pin-ion and not op-in-ion, and the o pronounced as in the word open and not as in opulence, which was the thing to be proved.

551. If theſe reaſons are valid with reſpect to the vowel in queſtion, they have the ſame force with reſpect to every other vowel not ſhut by a conſonant throughout the language. That the vowels in this ſituation are actually open, we may eaſily perceive by obſerving that vowel, which, from its diphthongal and ſemi-conſonant ſound, is leſs liable to ſuffer by obſcure pronunciation than any other. The letter u, in this ſituation, always preſerves itſelf full and open, as we may obſerve in utility, lucubration, &c. The o, the moſt open of all the ſingle vowels, has the ſame tendency in obedience, opake, oppoſition, &c. the e in the firſt ſyllable of event, in the ſecond of delegate, the firſt and third of evangeliſt, in the ſecond of gaiety, nicety, &c. the a in the firſt of abate, and the ſecond of probable, &c. and the i in nullity. This unaccented letter being no more than e, and this ſound, when long, correſponding exactly with its ſhort ſound, (which is not the caſe with any of the other vowels, (65) (66), the difference between the long and ſhort, or open and ſhut ſound of this letter, is leſs perceptible than in any other: yet we may eaſily perceive that a delicate pronunciation evidently leaves it open when unaccented in indiviſibility; as this word would not be juſtly pronounced if the i in every ſyllable were cloſed by a conſonant, as if divided into in-div-is-ib-il-it-y; the firſt, third, and fifth ſyllables, would, indeed, be juſtly pronounced according to this diviſion, as theſe have all accentual force, which ſhuts this vowel, and joins it to the

* I am aware that this ingenious writer ſeems to avoid this inconſiſtency, by premiſing in his Rhetorical Grammar, page 43, that he has ſometimes marked the o in words, beginning with a prepoſition with the oratorial, and ſometimes with the colloquial pronunciation. Thus in commune, communicate, &c. the oratorial ſound is given as in the firſt ſyllable of common, while the colloquial ſound changes the o into u, as if the words were written cummune, cummunicate, &c.; but the diſtinction in theſe examples does not touch the point; here there is a change only of one ſhort ſound for another, and not any promiſcuous uſe of a long and ſhort, or open and ſhut ſound of the ſame letter. Dr. Kenrick himſelf, when he marks the o in proboſcis, proceed, and procedure, does not adopt the ſhort u, as in commune, communicate, &c.; nor is he aware of the eſſential difference to the quantity of the vowel, in the double conſonant in one ſet of words, and the ſingle one in the other.

ſucceeding conſonant; but in the ſecond, fourth, and ſixth ſyllables, there is no ſuch force, and conſequently it muſt remain open and unconnected with the conſonant; though, as was before obſerved, the long and ſhort ſound of this vowel are ſo near each other, that the difference is leſs perceived than in the reſt. Every ear would be diſpleaſed at ſuch a pronunciation as is indicated by ut-til-lit-y, luc-cub-bration, op-pin-ion, op-pos-ition, ev-vent, ev-van-gel-liſt, ab-bate, prob-bab-ble, &c.; but for exactly the ſame reaſons that the vowels out of the ſtreſs ought to be kept open in theſe words, the ſlender i muſt be kept open in the ſame ſituation in the word in-di-vis-i-bil-i-ty, and every ſimilar word in the language*.

552. From all this it will neceſſarily follow, that the cuſtom adopted by the ancients and moderns of joining the ſingle conſonant to the latter vowel in ſyllabication, when inveſtigating the unknown ſound of a word, has its foundation in reaſon and good ſenſe†; that the only reaſon why vowels are ſhort and ſhut, is their junction with a conſonant; ſo thoſe that are not joined to conſonants cannot be ſaid to be either ſhort or ſhut: and that as all accented vowels, when final or pronounced alone, have their open ſound, ſo thoſe vowels that are alone or final in a ſyllable muſt neceſſarily retain their open ſound likewiſe, as nothing but uniting inſtantaneouſly with the ſucceeding conſonant can ſhut them: and though nothing but a delicate ear will direct us to the degree of openneſs, with which we muſt pronounce the firſt unaccented o in docility, domeſtic, potential, proceed, monaſtic, monotony, &c. we may be aſſured that it is exactly under the ſame predicament, with reſpect to ſound, in all theſe words: and as they can never be pronounced ſhort and ſhut, as if written doſſility, dommeſtic, &c. without hurting the dulleſt ear; ſo the e in event, evangeliſt, &c. and the i in the third ſyllable of utility, and in the ſecond, fourth, and ſixth of indiviſibility, can never be ſounded as if joined to the conſonant without offending every delicate ear, and overturning the firſt principles of pronunciation.

553. The only conſiderable exception to this general rule of ſyllabication which determines the ſound of the unaccented vowels, is when e ſucceeds the accent, and is followed by r, as in literal, general, miſery, &c. which can never be pronounced lit-e-ral, gen-e-ral, mis-e-ry, &c. without the appearance of affectation. In this ſituation we find the r corrupt the ſound of the e, as it does that of every other vowel when in a final unaccented ſyllable. For this conſonant being nothing more than a jar, it unavoidably mixes with the e in this ſituation, and reduces it to the obſcure ſound of ſhort u, (418), a ſound to which the other unaccented vowels before r have ſometimes ſo evident a tendency.

554. An obſcure idea of the principles of ſyllabication juſt laid down, and the contradiction to them perceived in this exception, has made moſt of our orthöepiſts extremely wavering and uncertain in their diviſion of words into ſyllables, when the unaccented e has preceded r. Perhaps nothing will better ſhow the juſtneſs of this obſervation than a view of the varieties which our beſt writers have adopted when theſe letters have occurred in this ſituation, where we not only find them differing from each other, but ſometimes even from themſelves:

† When an aſſemblage of letters are preſented to the eye, of which we know not the actual ſound—if the three firſt letters of this aſſemblage be a conſonant between two vowels, we naturally pronounce the firſt vowel alone, and conſequentlylong and open; as this is beginning with the ſimpleſt portion of the aſſemblage, the conſonant is neceſſarily carried to the ſucceeding vowel, which, if not followed by a double conſonant, is left long and open like the firſt, and for the ſame reaſon. If a double conſonant ſucceed, the vowel naturally unites with the firſt by which it is ſhortened; as neither two identical, nor two uncombinable conſonants, can begin a ſyllable; if the conſonants are combinable, nothing but the actual pronunciation of the word will direct us whether we ought to unite the preceding vowel to the firſt conſonant, or leave it open; but if the actual pronunciation of the word be already known, there can be no reaſon for dividing it into ſyllables, but conveying the ſound of it to others; and this is a very different operation from endeavouring to diſcover the ſound of it ourſelves, (538) (542).

555. I have been the more copious in my collection of theſe varieties, that I might not appear to have taken the advantage of any overſight or miſtake of the preſs. Nor is it any wonder when the principles of ſyllabication ſo ſtrongly incline us to leave the vowel e, like the other vowels, open before a ſingle conſonant; and the ear ſo decidedly tells us, that this letter is not always open when preceded by the accent, and followed by r, it is no wonder, I ſay, that a writer ſhould be perplexed, and that he ſhould ſometimes incline to one ſide, and ſometimes to the other. I am conſcious I have not always been free from this inconſiſtency myſelf. The examples therefore which I have ſelected, will, I hope, fully juſtify me in the ſyllabication I have adopted; which is, that of ſometimes ſeparating the e from the r in this ſituation, and ſometimes not. When ſolemn and deliberate ſpeaking has ſeemed to admit of lengthening the e, I have ſometimes made it end the ſyllable; when this was not the caſe, I have ſometimes joined it to the r. Thus as e in the penultimate ſyllable of incarcerate, reverberate, &c. ſeems, in ſolemn ſpeaking, to admit of a ſmall degree of length and diſtinctneſs, it ends a ſyllable; but as no ſolemnity of pronunciation ſeems to admit of the ſame length and openneſs of the e in tolerate, deliberate, &c. it is united with r, and ſounded in the notation by ſhort u. It ought, however, to be carefully obſerved, that though the e in this ſituation is ſometimes ſeparated from the r, there is no ſpeaking, however deliberate and ſolemn, that will not admit of uniting it to r, and pronouncing it like ſhort u without offending the niceſt and moſt critical ear.

556. It muſt alſo be noted, that this alteration of the ſound of e before r is only when it follows the accent, either primary or ſecondary, (522) (530); for when it is in the firſt ſyllable of a word, though unaccented, it keeps its true ſound. Thus, though the e is pronounced like u in alter, alteration, &c. yet in perfection, terrific, &c. this letter is as pure as when the accent is on it in perfect, terrible, &c.

557. Something like the corruption of the ſound of unaccented e before r we may perceive in the colloquial pronunciation of the vowel o in the ſame ſituation; and accordingly we find our beſt orthöepiſts differ in their notation of this letter: thus memory, memorable, immemorable, memorably, memorize, have the o pronounced like ſhort u by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott, and memorandum with the o, as in open; while Dr. Kenrick gives the o in all theſe words the ſound it has in the conjunction or. Mr. Sheridan marks the unaccented o in corporal, corporate, and corporation, like the o in open; but Mr. Scott pronounces this o in corporal, corporate, and corporation, like ſhort u, and the ſame letter in incorporate and incorporation like Mr. Sheridan; and Dr. Kenrick like the o in the former inſtances. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott are uniform in their pronunciation of the ſame vowel like ſhort u in armour, armorer, armory, pillory, ſuaſory, perſuaſory, allegory, compulſory, curſory, and predatory; while Dr. Kenrick pronounces the o in armour and armory like the o in open, and the ſame letter in pillory, allegory, and curſory, like the o in or, nor, &c. This diverſity, among good judges, can ariſe from nothing but the ſame uncertainty of the ſound of this letter that we have juſt obſerved of the e; but if we narrowly watch our pronunciation, we ſhall find that the unaccented o may be opened and lengthened, in deliberate ſpeaking, without hurting the ear, which is not always the caſe with e; and this has induced me generally to ſeparate the o from the ſucceeding r when immediately following the accent; though I am ſenſible that the rapidity of colloquial ſpeaking often reduces it to ſhort u without offending the ear: but when the o is removed more than one ſyllable from the accent, the moſt deliberate ſpeaking generally lets it ſlide into the other vowel; for which reaſon I have commonly marked it in this manner. See COMMAND.

558. It may, perhaps, appear to ſome of my readers, that too much time has been ſpent upon theſe nice diſtinctions of ſound, in which judges themſelves are found to diſagree; but when we conſider how many ſyllables in the language are unaccented, and that theſe ſyllables are thoſe in which the peculiar delicacy of the pronounciation of natives conſiſts; when we reflect on the neceſſity of having as diſtinct and permanent ſounds as poſſible, to which we may refer theſe fleeting and evaneſcent ones, we ſhall not look upon an attempt to arreſt and inveſtigate them as a uſeleſs part of philology.

DICTIONARY AND EXPOSITOR OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The figures between the parenthesis refer to the numbers in the Principles of Pronunciation prefixed to this Dictionary, where the different sounds of the letters are explained at large. Thus (73) refers to the first sound of the letter A; (93) to the first sound of the letter E; and so of the rest.

The figures over the letters refer to the vowels in the words at the top of the page; and the index ☞ before these words, refers to the table of simple and diphthongal sounds, where the different sounds of the vowels are exhibited at one view. Thus ☞ (559) refers to the Table in the opposite page.

☞ (559). Fāte (73), fär (77), fall (83), făt (81); mē (93), mĕt (95); pīne (105), pĭn (107); nō (162), mŏve (164), nŏr (167), nŏt (163); tūbe (171), tŭb (172), bŭll (173); o͞il (299); pou͞nd (313); *th*in (466), THIS (469).

A, The first letter of the alphabet (73). A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree. Before a word beginning with a vowel, it is written an, as an ox; A is sometimes a noun, as great A; A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; gone a hunting, come a begging: A has a signification denoting proportion; the landlord hath a hundred a year.

☞ The change of the letter a into an before a vowel or mute h for the sake of sound, seems to deserve more attention than has generally been given to it by any of our Grammarians, and will therefore be considered under the article An; which see.

Of the Alphabetical Pronunciation of the Letter A.

So many profound and ingenious observations have been made upon this first step to literature, that volumes might be filled with the erudition that has been lavished on this letter alone. The priority of place it claims, in all alphabets, has made it so much the object of attention, that philologists suppose the foundation of learning but weakly laid till the natural and civil history of the first letter be fully settled.

But however deep have been their researches into the origin of this letter, we find no author in our language has hitherto attempted to settle the disputes that have arisen between the natives of England, Ireland, and Scotland, about the true sound of it, when called by its name. Instead, therefore, of tracing this character through the circles of Gomer, the Egyptian Hieroglyphics, the mysterious Abraxas, or the Irish Ogum, I shall endeavour to obviate a difficulty that frequently arises when it is pronounced in the Hornbook: or, in other words; to enquire what is the true name of the first letter of the English Alphabet. Whether we are to say Aye, B, C; Ah, B, C; or Aw, B, C.

And first, it will be necessary to consider the nature of a vowel; which grammarians are generally agreed in defining to be "a simple articulate sound, formed by the impulse of the "voice by the opening only of the mouth in "a particular manner." Now as every vowel by itself is sounded long, as nothing but its junction with a consonant can make it otherwise, it is natural, when pronouncing this vowel alone, to give it the long open sound; but as this long open sound is threefold, as heard in face, father, and water, a question arises which of these long sounds shall we adopt as a common name to the whole species of this letter? The English make choice of the a in face, the Irish of that in father, and the Scotch of that in water. Each party produces words where the letter a is sounded in the manner they contend for; but when we demand why one should have the preference, the controversy is commonly at an end; any farther reasons are either too remote or too insignificant to be produced: and indeed, if a diversity of names to vowels did not confound us in our spelling, or declaring to each other the component letters of a word, it would be entirely needless to enter into so trifling a question as the mere name of a letter; but when we find ourselves unable to convey signs to each other on account of this diversity of names, and that words themselves are endangered by an improper utterance of their component parts, it seems highly incumbent on us to attempt an uniformity in this point; which, insignificant as it may seem, is undoubtedly the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation.

The first rule for naming a letter, when pronounced alone, seems to be this: Whatever sound we give to a letter, when terminating a syllable, the same sound ought to be given to it when pronounced alone, because, in both cases, they have their primary, simple sound, uninfluenced by a succeeding vowel or consonant; and therefore, when we pronounce a letter alone, it ought to have such a sound as does not suppose the existence of any other letter. But wherever a terminates a syllable with the accent upon it, (the only state in which it can be said to be pure) it has always the English sound of that letter. The only exceptions to this rule are, the words fa-ther, ma-ster, and wa-ter; and that these are merely exceptions, appears from the uniformity with which the a is pronounced otherwise in pa-rent, papal, taper, fatal, &c. The other vowels have their names exactly similar to the sound they have in a similar situation, as the e like that in me-grim, the i like the i in ti-tle, the o as the o in noble, and the u like the u in tu-tor. Thus, as it appears from the general analogy of pronunciation, that the sound of the a, which the English adopt, is the only one that does not necessarily suppose the existence of any other sound; it inevitably follows that theirs only is the proper appellation of that letter.

But there is another analogy by which we may determine the true sound of the vowels when pronounced singly, and that is, the sound they have when preserved long and open by the final e. Thus we call the letter e by the sound it has in theme, the letter i as it sounds in time, the letter o as heard in tone, and the u as in tune; and why the letter a should not be pronounced as heard in face cannot be conceived, as each of the other vowels has, like a, a variety of other sounds, as they are united with letters which, in some measure, alter their quality.

In consequence of entertaining a different idea of the a, when pronounced in the alphabet, we see the natives of Ireland very prone to a different pronunciation of the words where this letter occurs; and, indeed, it is quite consistent with their doctrine of the sound of a, that the words parent, papal, taper, and fatal, should be pronounced pah-rent, pah-pal, tah-per, and fah-tal. We find the Scotch, likewise, inclinable to the same pronunciation of a, when in words, as when alone. Thus we hear Sawtan for Satan, sawcred for sacred, and law-ity for laity; and this is perfectly consistent with the manner in which they pronounce the letter a, when alone: there is no medium: if this be not the true pronunciation of these words, the a is certainly to be sounded as the English do: for, whenever the English give the Italian sound, as it may be called to the a, except in the words father and master, it is always in consequence of its junction with some consonant, which determines it to that sound; as in monosyllables terminating in r; as bar, car, far: but where it is not affected by a succeeding consonant, as in the words parent, papal, natal, fatal, we then hear it pronounced as the slender English a, both in and out of composition.

It will, perhaps, be objected, that the most frequent short sound of a as heard in cat, rat, mat, carry, marry, parry, is the short sound of the Italian a in father, car, mar, par, and not the short sound of the a in care, mare, and pare; but it may be answered, that this want of correspondence between the name of the letter, and the most frequent short sound, is common to the rest of the vowels: for the o, as heard in cot, not, rot, is not the short sound of the o in coat, note, wrote, but of the a in water; or of the diphthongs in caught, naught, and wrought; and if we ought to call the a, ab, because its short sound corresponds to au, for the very same reason we ought to call the o, au; and a similar alteration must take place with the rest of the vowels. As therefore, from the variety of sounds the vowels have, it is impossible to avoid the inconvenience of sometimes sounding the letter one way in a syllable, and another way in a word, we must either adopt the simple long sound when we would pronounce the letter alone, or invent new names for every different sound in a different word, in order to obviate the difficulty.

It must not be dissembled, however, that the sound of a, when terminating a syllable not under the accent, seems more inclined to the Irish than the English a, and that the ear is less disgusted with the sound of Ab-mer-i-cab than of A-mer-i-can: but to this it may be answered, that letters not under the accent, in a thousand instances, deviate from their true sound; that the vowel a, like several other vowels in a final syllable not accented, has an obscure sound, bordering on u; but if the a, in this situation, were pronounced ever so distinctly, and that this pronunciation were clearly the a in father, it would be nothing to the purpose: when the a is pronounced alone, it may be said, not only to be a letter, but a distinct character, and a noun substantive; and as such, has the same force as the letters in an accented syllable. The letter a, therefore, as the first character in the alphabet, may always be said to have the accent, and ought to have the same long, open sound, as is given to that letter when accented in a syllable, and not influenced in its sound by any preceding or succeeding consonant.

We may therefore conclude that if all vowels, when pronounced alone, are accented and long, if spelling be the pronunciation of letters alone, (as it would be absurd to suppose ourselves acquainted with the different consonants that determine the sound of the vowels before they are pronounced) it follows, that in spelling, or repeating the component parts of a word, we ought to give those parts their simple and uncombined sound: but there is no uncombined sound of the vowel a, except the slender sound contended for, unless in the words father and master; and therefore, when we repeat letters singly, in order to declare the sound of a word, we must undoubtedly give the first letter of the alphabet the sound we ever give it in the first syllable of the numerous class la-dy, pa-gan, ma-son, ba-sin, &c.

Thus, after placing every objection in its strongest light, and deducing our arguments from the simplest and clearest principles, this important question seems at last decided in favour of the English; who, independent of the arguments in their favour, may be presumed to have a natural right to determine the name of the letter in question, though it has been so often litigated by their formidable and learned, though junior, relations. For though, in some cases, the natives of Ireland and Scotland adhere rather more closely to analogy than the English themselves, yet in this we find the English pronounce perfectly agreeable to rule; and, that the slender pronunciation of the letter a, as they pronounce it in the alphabet, is no more than giving it that simple sound, it ever has, when unconnected with vowels or consonants that alter its power.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in marking the ſs in this word, and, I think, with the beſt uſage on my ſide. Though double s is almoſt always pronounced ſharp and hiſſing, yet when a ſharp s precedes, it ſeems more agreeable to the ear to pronounce the ſucceeding s flat. Thus, though the termination ition is always ſharp, yet becauſe the s in tranſition is neceſſarily ſharp, the t goes into the flat ſound, as if written tranſizhion.

☞ In the firſt edition of this Dictionary I followed the accentuation of Johnſon and Aſh in this word, and placed the ſtreſs upon the firſt ſyllable contrary to what I had done ſome years before in the Rhyming Dictionary, where I had placed the accent on the ſecond, and which was the accentuation adopted by Mr. Sheridan. Upon a cleaner inſpection of the analogies of the language I find this the preferable mode of marking it, as words in this termination, though very irregular, generally follow the ſtreſs of the correſponding noun or verb; and conſequently this word ought to have the ſame accent as abſolve, which is the more immediate relation of the word in queſtion, and not the accent of abſolute, which is the moſt diſtant (512). Kenrick, W. Johnſton, Entick, and Nares, have not inſerted this word; and Mr. Perry very improperly accents it upon the third ſyllable.

☞ Dr. Johnſon tells us, that this word was anciently and properly accented on the firſt ſyllable, though now frequently on the ſecond. That it was accented on the firſt ſyllable till within theſe few years, is pretty generally remembered; and if Shakeſpeare did not, by poetical licence, violate the accentuation of his time, it was certainly pronounced ſo two centuries ago, as appears by Dr. Johnſon's quotation of him, but the accentuation of this word formerly, on the firſt ſyllable, is ſo generally acknowledged, as not to ſtand in need of poetic authority. The queſtion is, whether this accentuation, or that which places the ſtreſs on the ſecond ſyllable, is the moſt proper. To wave, therefore, the authority of cuſtom, which precludes all reaſoning on language, and reduces the diſpute to a mere matter of fact, it may be preſumed, that whatever is agreeable to the moſt general uſage of the language in ſimilar words, is the moſt proper in this; and if it appears that general uſage, in ſimilar words, is in favour of the old pronunciation, it muſt certainly, for that reaſon, be allowed to be the beſt. And firſt it may be obſerved, that as our language is almoſt as averſe to the accent on the laſt ſyllable, as the Latin, it is a general cuſtom with us, when we adopt a word from the Latin, and abridge it of one or two of its ſyllables, to remove the accent, at leaſt a ſyllable higher, than it was in the original language, that the accent, when the word is naturaliſed, may not reſt on the laſt. Thus of Homérus, we make Hómer; of Virgílius, Vírgil; and of Horátius, Hórace, Hyacínthus, altered to Hy'acinth, removes the accent two ſyllables higher; and cæremónia, become céremony, does the ſame; and no law, that I know of, forbids us to accent academia; or if you will Ἀκαδημία, when turned into academy, on the firſt ſyllable, as it was conſtantly accented by our anceſtors, who, receiving Greek through the medium of Latin, generally pronounced Greek words according to the Latin analogy, and therefore neceſſarily placed the accent of academia on the third ſyllable, which, when reduced to academy, required the accent to be removed higher.

"Our court ſhall be a little academy,
"Still and contemplative in living arts."

But how, it will be ſaid, does this account for placing the accent on the firſt ſyllable of the Engliſh word academy, rather than the ſecond? To this it may be anſwered, that the numberleſs inſtances of preference given by the accent to the firſt ſyllable in ſimilar words, ſuch as melancholy, parſimony, dilatory, &c. might be a ſufficient authority without any other reaſon.

But, perhaps, it will be pardoned me if I go farther, and hazard a ſuppoſition that ſeems to account for the very common practice of placing the accent of ſo many of the longer polyſyllables from the Latin on the firſt or ſecond ſyllable. Though in the Latin there never was more than one accent upon a word, yet, in our pronunciation of Latin, we commonly place an accent on alternate ſyllables, as in our own words; and when the Latin word, by being angliciſed, becomes ſhorter, the alternate accent becomes the principal. Thus in pronouncing the Latin word academia, the Engliſh naturally place an accent on the firſt and third ſyllable, as if divided into ác-a-dé-mi-a; ſo that when the word becomes angliciſed into ác-a-de-my, the firſt ſyllable retains the accent it had when the word was Latin. On the other hand it may be conjectured with ſome probability, that a fondneſs for pronouncing like the French has been the occaſion of the alteration. As the Engliſh ever ſuppoſe the French place the accent on the laſt ſyllable, in endeavouring to pronounce this word after their manner, the ſtreſs muſt naturally fall on the ſecond and laſt ſyllables, as if divided into a-cád-a-mie; and from an imitation of this, it is probable the preſent pronunciation of the word was produced. Thus we have a very probable reaſon why ſo many of our longer words from the Latin are accented ſo near the beginning; as, in this mode of pronouncing them, they ſeem to retain one of the accents of the original. Hence the long train of words, voluntary, comparable, diſputable, admirable, &c. have the accent on the firſt ſyllable, becauſe in pronouncing the words voluntarius, comparabilis, diſputabilis, admirabilis, &c. we commonly lay a ſtreſs upon the firſt, as well as the third ſyllable. As to the analogy, as Mr. Sheridan pretends, of pronouncing this word with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, becauſe words ending in my have the accent on the antepenultimate, nothing can be more ill founded. True it is, that words of this termination never have the accent on the penultimate; but, that for this reaſon, they muſt neceſſarily have the accent on the antepenultimate, I cannot well comprehend. If polygamy, œconomy, aſtronomy, &c. (513) have their accent on the antepenultimate, it ariſes from the nature of the terminations; which being, as it were, a ſpecies, and applicable to a thouſand other words, have, like logy and graphy, the accent always on the preceding ſyllable; which ſeems beſt to unite the compound into one word: but academy being a ſimple, is ſubject to no ſuch rule, and ſeems naturally to incline to a different analogy of pronunciation. Thus Dr. Johnſon ſeems to have decided juſtly in ſaying the word academy ought to have the accent on the firſt ſyllable: though preſent uſage, it muſt be confeſſed, ſeems to lead to the contrary pronunciation.

☞ This word is in no Engliſh Dictionary I have met with; but conceiving its formation to be perfectly agreeable to the analogy of Engliſh adjectives, and finding it uſed by ſeveral very reſpectable authors, I have ventured to inſert it. Mr. Foſter, in his Eſſay on Accent and Quantity, ſays: "When a high note ſucceeds a low one, or riſes above the grave "tone of voice, the perception of it is ſudden "and inſtantaneous, before the continuance of "the note is determined one way or the other "for long or ſhort. This I more clearly "conceive, than I can perhaps expreſs. I can "however engage to make it preceptible to a "common Engliſh ear in any Greek word, "according to its preſent accentual mark." And Dr. Galley, in his Diſſertation againſt Greek Accents, makes uſe of the ſame word, where he ſays, "For if ΠΟΣΩΙ means, ac"cording to Mr. Foſter, that oratorical or "common diſcourſe differs from muſic only "in the number of ſounds, i. e. that the former has only four or five notes, but that the "latter has many more, then the accentual "pronunciation of a Greek ſentence will not "differ from the ſinging of the ſame ſentence, "when ſet to four or five correſponding notes "in muſic, i. e. it will in both caſes be a "ſong."

☞ Within theſe twenty years this word has ſhifted its accent from the ſecond to the firſt ſyllable. There are now few polite ſpeakers who do not pronounce it ac′ceptable; and it is much to be regretted that this pronunciation is become ſo general; for where conſonants of ſo different an organ as p and t are near the end of a word, the word is pronounced with much more difficulty when the accent is removed higher than when it is arreſted by theſe letters: for in this caſe, the force which accompanies the accent facilitates the organs in their tranſition from the formation of the one letter to the other. As nature, therefore, directs us to place the accent upon theſe conſonants in all words ending in active, ective, itive, otive, and uctive; ctible, ectible, octible, and uctible; ſo we ought to liſten to the ſame voice in pronouncing acceptable, ſuſceptible, corruptible, with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable.—See Commendable.

s. Intelligence, information; notice of any thing published in a paper of intelligence.

☞ As nouns ending in ment always follow the accentuation of the verbs from which they are formed, we frequently hear advertisement taxed with the grossest irregularity for having the accent on a different syllable from advertise. The origin of this irregularity seems to have arisen from a change which has taken place in the pronunciation of the verb since the noun has been formed: advertise and chastise were, in Shakespeare's time, both accented on the penultimate, and therefore advertisement and chastisement were formed regularly from them.

"Wherein he did the King his lord advertise."
HEN. VIII.

"My grief cries louder than advertisement."
MUCH ADO, &c.

"Oh, then how quickly should this arm of "mine,
"Now pris'ner to the palsy, chastise thee."
RICHARD II.

"And chastisement doth therefore hide its "head."
JUL. CÆSAR.

But since that time the verbs advertise and chastise have fallen into an analogy more agreeable to verbs of the same form—for the verbs to promise, practise, franchise, mortise, and divertise, are the only words where the termination ise has not the accent either primary or secondary; and if an alteration must be made to reconcile the pronunciation of the simple with that of the compound, we should find it much easier to change advértisement and chástisement into advertisement and chastisement than advertise and chastise into advértise and chástise; but the irregularity seems too inveterate to admit of any alteration.

☞ There is a strong propensity in undisciplined speakers to pronounce this word with the accent on e in the penultimate; but this cannot be too carefully avoided, as all the compounds of alien have invariably the accent on the first syllable. But whether the a in this syllable be long or short, is a dispute among our best Orthoepists. Mr. Perry, Mr. Buchanan, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Elphinstone, join it with the consonant, and make it short; but Mr. Sheridan separates it from the l, and makes it long and slender: and though Mr. Elphinstone's opinion has great weight with me, yet I here join with Mr. Sheridan against them all; not only because I judge his pronunciation of this word the most agreeable to the best usage, but because it is agreeable to an evident rule which lengthens every vowel with the accent on it, except i when followed by a single consonant and a diphthong—for which, see Principles, No. (505) (534).

☞ A few years ago there was an affectation of pronouncing this word, when a noun, with the accent on the firſt ſyllable; and this had an appearance of preciſion from the general cuſtom of accenting nouns in this manner, when the ſame word, as a verb, had the accent on the laſt: (492) but a cloſer inſpection into the analogies of the language ſhewed this pronunciation to be improper, as it interfered with an univerſal rule, which was, to pronounce the y like e in a final unaccented ſyllable. But whatever was the reaſon of this novelty, it now ſeems to have ſubſided; and this word is now generally pronounced with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, as it is uniformly marked by all the Orthöepiſts in our language.

☞ This word is divided into three ſyllables by Mr. Sheridan, and but into two by Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnſton. The latter is, in my opinion, preferable. My reaſon is, that though this plural word is perfectly Latin, and in that language is pronounced in three ſyllables; yet as we have the ſingular aloe in two ſyllables, we ought to form the plural according to our own analogy, and pronounce it in two ſyllables likewiſe.—See Antipodes.

☞ The firſt ſyllable of this word, and of the ſeven that follow it, except although, are ſubject to a double pronunciation, between which it is not very eaſy to decide. There is a general rule in the language, that l, followed by another conſonant, gives the preceding a its broad ſound, as in falſe. This rule is ſubject to ſeveral exceptions (84); and if we take in theſe words into the exceptions, there is ſome doubt of the exceptions becoming the general rule. But the a in queſtion is now ſo generally pronounced, as in the firſt ſyllable of alley, valley, &c. that we ſhould riſe the imputation of inaccuracy to ſound it otherwiſe. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Scott, are uniformly for this latter ſound of a. Mr. Perry marks all in the ſame manner, except altercate and altercation; and W. Johnſton has only the words altercation and alternative, which he pronounces in the former manner. It is certain that the former was the true Angloſaxon ſound, and it is highly probable that the latter has only obtained within theſe few years, in words obviouſly derived from the Latin as theſe are; but there ſeems to be a groſſneſs in one ſound, and a neatneſs in the other, which has ſo decidedly given one of them the preference.

AN, ăn, article.

☞ This indefinite, and, as it may be called, the euphonic article, is ſaid by all our Grammarians to be uſed before a vowel or h mute; but no notice is taken of uſing a inſtead of it before what is called a vowel, as a uſeful book, a uſual ceremony, a uſurer, &c.; nor is any mention made of its conſtant uſage before h when it is not mute, if the accent of the word be on the ſecond ſyllable, as an heroic action, an hiſtorical account, &c. This want of accuracy ariſes from a want of analyzing the vowels, and not attending ſufficiently to the influence of accent on pronunciation. A proper inveſtigation of the power of the vowels would have informed our Grammarians, that the letter u, when long, is not ſo properly a vowel as a ſemi-conſonant, and perfectly equivalent to commencing y (8); and that a feeling of this has inſenſibly influenced the beſt ſpeakers to prefix a to it in their converſation, while a confuſed idea of the general rule ariſing from an ignorance of the nature of the letters has generally induced them to prefix an to it in writing. The ſame obſervations are applicable to the h. The ear alone tells us, that before heroic, hiſtorical, &c. the an ought invariably to be uſed; but by not diſcovering that it is the abſence of accent on the h that makes an admiſſible in theſe words, we are apt to prefix an to words where the h is ſounded, as an horſe, an houſe, &c., and thus ſet our ſpoken and written language at variance. This ſeems better to account for the want of accuracy in this article than a conjecture I once heard from Dr. Johnſon, that our anceſtors, particularly in the time of the Spectator, where this miſapplication of the article frequently occurs, did not pronounce the h at the beginning of words ſo often as we do. However this may be, it ſeems neceſſary to a correctneſs of language to make our orthography and pronunciation as conſiſtent as poſſible: for which purpoſe it may not be uſeleſs to attend to the following general rules. The article A muſt be uſed before all words beginning with a conſonant, and before the vowel u when long: and the article An muſt be uſed before all words beginning with a vowel, except long u; before words beginning with h mute as an hour, an heir, &c., or before words where the h is not mute, if the accent be on the ſecond ſyllable, as an heroic action, an hiſtorical account, &c. For the few words in our language where the h is mute, ſee this letter in the Principles, No. 394: and for a juſt idea of the letter u, and the reaſon why it admits of an before it when long, ſee Principles, No. 8, and the Notes upon it.

☞ This word is vulgarly pronounced Sparrowgrass. It may be observed, that such words as the vulgar do not know how to spell, and which convey no definite idea of the thing, are frequently changed by them into such words as they do know how to spell, and which do convey some definite idea. The word in question is an instance of it: and the corruption of this word into Sparrowgrass is so general, that asparagus has an air of stiffness and pedantry. See Lantern.

Look, air, appearance; countenance; glance, view, act of beholding; direction towards any point, position; disposition of any thing to something else; relation; disposition of a planet to other planets.

☞ This word, as a noun, was universally pronounced with the accent on the last syllable till about the middle of the seventeenth century. It grew antiquated in Milton's time, and is now entirely obsolete. Dr. Farmer's observations on this word, in his no less solid than ingenious Essay on The Learning of Shakespeare, are so curious, as well as just, that the reader will, I doubt not, be obliged to me for quoting them.

"Sometimes a very little matter detects a forgery. You may remember a play called "the Double Falshood, which Mr. Theobald "was desirous of palming upon the world for "a posthumous one of Shakespeare: and I see "it is classed as such in the last edition of the "Bodleian catalogue. Mr. Pope himself, "after all the strictures of Scriblerus, in a letter to Aaron Hill, supposes it of that age; "but a mistaken accent determines it to have "been written since the middle of the last "century.

——"This late example
"Of base Henriquez, bleeding in me now,
"From each good aspect takes away my trust,"
"And in another place,
"You have an aspect, Sir, of wondrous wisdom."
"The word aspect, you perceive, is here accented on the first syllable, which, I am "confident, in any sense of it, was never the "case in the time of Shakespeare; though it "may sometimes appear to be so, when we do "not observe a preceding Elision.
"Some of the professed imitators of our old "poets have not attended to this and many "other minutiæ: I could point out to you "several performances in the respective styles "of Chaucer, Spenser, and Shakespeare, "which the imitated bard could not possibly "have either read or construed.
"This very accent hath troubled the annotators "on Milton. Dr. Bentley observes it to be "a tone different from the present use." Mr. "Manwaring, in his Treatise of Harmony and "Numbers, very solemnly informs us, that "this verse is defective both in accent and "quantity,
"His words here ended, but his meek aspect
"Silent yet spake,"

"Here, says he, a syllable is acuted and long, "whereas it should be short and graved."
"And a still more extraordinary gentleman, "one Green, who published a specimen of a "new version of the Paradise Lost, into "Blank verse, "by which that amazing work "is brought somewhat nearer the summit of "perfection," begins with correcting a blunder "in the fourth book,

——"The setting sun
"Slowly descended, and with right aspect—
"Levell'd his evening rays."

"Not so in the new version,
"Meanwhile the setting sun descending slow—
"Level'd with aspect right his evening rays."
"Enough of such commentators.—The cele"brated Dr. Dee had a spirit, who would "sometimes condescend to correct him, when "peccant in quantity; and it had been kind "of him to have a little assisted the weight "abovementioned.—Milton affected the an"tique; but it may seem more extraordinary, "that the old accent should be adopted in "Hudibras."

AUTHORITY, âw-thŏr'ê-tê. ſ. Legal power; influence, credit; power, rule; ſupport, countenance; teſtimony; credibility.

☞ This word is ſometimes pronounced as if written autority. This affected pronunciation is traced to a gentleman who is one of the greateſt ornaments of the law, as well as one of the politeſt ſcholars of the age, and whoſe authority has been ſufficient to ſway the bench and the bar, though author, authentic, theatre, theory, &c. and a thouſand ſimilar words where the th is heard, are conſtantly ſtaring them in the face.

The public ear, however, is not ſo far vitiated as to acknowledge this innovation; for though it may with ſecurity, and even approbation, be pronounced in Weſtminſter Hall, it would not be quite ſo ſafe for an actor to adopt it on the ſtage.

I know it will be ſaid that authoritas is latter Latin, that the purer Latin never had the h; and that our word, which is derived from it, ought, on that account, to omit it. But it may be obſerved, that, according to the beſt Latin critics, the word ought to be written auctoritas, and that, according to this reaſoning, we ought to write and pronounce auctority and auctor: but this, I preſume, is farther than theſe innovators would chooſe to go. The truth is, ſuch ſingularities of pronunciation ſhould be left to the lower order of critics; who, like coxcombs in dreſs, would be utterly unnoticed if they were not diſtinguiſhed by petty deviations from the reſt of the world.

ESSAY ON MAN, Ep. 1. v. 215.

BARYTONE, bă'rē-tōne. s. ☞ A word with the grave accent on the laſt ſyllable. If the inſpector does not know what is meant by the grave accent, it may be neceſſary to inform him, that writers on the Greek accent tell us that every ſyllable which has not the acute accent has the grave; and as there could but be one ſyllable acuted in that language, the reſt muſt neceſſarily be grave. What theſe accents are has puzzled the learned ſo much that they ſeem neither to underſtand each other nor themſelves; but it were to be wiſhed they had kept this diſtinction into acute and grave out of our own language, as it is impoſſible to annex any clear ideas to it, except we conſider the grave accent merely as the abſence of the acute, which reduces it to no accent at all. If we divide the voice into its two leading inflexions, the riſing and falling, and call the former the acute and the latter the grave, we can annex diſtinct ideas to theſe words; and perhaps it is an ignorance of this diſtinction of ſpeaking ſounds, and confounding them with high and low, or loud and ſoft, that occaſions the confuſion we meet with in writers on this ſubject.—See Elements of Elocution, vol. 1. page 112.

BEARD, bēērd. s. (228).
The hear that grows on the lips and chin; ſharp prickles growing upon the ears of corn; a barb on an arrow.
☞ This word, as Dr. Kenrick obſerves, is frequently pronounced ſo as to rhyme with herd; but I am of his opinion that this pronunciation is improper. Mr. Scott and Mr. Perry give it both ways. Buchanan ſounds it ſhort like Mr. Sheridan. W. Johnſton makes it rhyme with laird, a Scotch lord: but Mr. Elphinſton, who is the moſt accurate obſerver of pronunciation I ever met with, gives it as I have done. The ſtage has, in my opinion, adopted the ſhort ſound of the diphthong without good reaſon, and in this inſtance ought not to be followed; as the long ſound is not only more agreeable to analogy, but to general uſage. I am glad to find my opinion confirmed by ſo good a judge as Mr. Smith; and though the poets ſo often ſacrifice pronunciation to rhyme, that their authority, in theſe caſes, is not always deciſive, yet, as Shakeſpeare ſays on another occaſion,

"They ſtill may help to thicken other proofs
"That do demonſtrate thinly."—OTHELLO.

"Rail'd at their covenant, and jeer'd
"Their reverend perſons to my beard."
HUDIBRAS.

"Some thin remains of chaſtity appear'd
"Ev'n under Jove, but Jove without a beard."
DRYDEN.

The impropriety of pronouncing this word as it is heard on the ſtage, will perhaps appear more perceptible by carrying this pronunciation into the compounds; as the falſe ſound of great may be detected by the phraſe Alexander the Great (241).

"Old propheſies foretel our fall at hand,
"When bearded men in floating caſtles land.
"And as young ſtriplings whip the top for ſport,
"On the ſmooth pavement of an empty court,
"The wooden engine flies and whirls about,
"Admir'd with clamours, of the beardleſs rout."

☞ The past time of this verb is by the English uniformly pronounced like the present. Nay, except in solemn language, the present preterit and participle are exactly the same; while the Irish, more agreeably to analogy, as well as utility, pronounce the preterit as the noun bet, a wager; and this pronounciation, though contrary to English usage, is quite conformable to that general tendency observable in the preterits of irregular verbs, which is to shorten the vowel that is long in the present, as eat, ate, (often pronounced et); bear, beard; deal, dealt; mean, meant; dream, dreamt; &c.

☞ From what oddity I know not, this word is frequently pronounced as if accented on the laſt ſyllable but one, and is generally found written as if it ought to be ſo pronounced, the t being doubled, as is uſual when a participle is formed from a verb that has its accent on the laſt ſyllable. Dr. Johnſon, indeed, has very judiciouſly ſet both orthography and pronunciation to rights, and ſpells the word with one t, though he finds it with two in the quotations he gives us from Garth and Swift. That the former thought it might be pronounced with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, is highly preſumable from the uſe he makes of it, where he ſays:

" Reſt, health, and eaſe, for nothing but a
" name."

For if we do not lay the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, here, the verſe will be unpardonably rugged. This miſtake muſt certainly take its riſe from ſuppoſing a verb which does not exiſt, namely, to begot; but as this word is derived from a ſubſtantive, it ought to have the ſame accent; thus though the words ballot and billet are verbs as well as nouns, yet as they have the accent on the firſt ſyllable, the participial adjectives derived from them have only one t, and both are pronounced with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, as balloted, billeted. Bigoted therefore ought to have but one t, and to preſerve the accent on the firſt ſyllable.

☞ This word and bipedal have the i long in Dr. Aſh and Mr. Sheridan; but Mr. Perry makes the i in the firſt long, and in the laſt ſhort: analogy, however, ſeems to decide in favour of the ſound I have given it. For though the penultimate accent has a tendency to lengthen the vowel when followed by a ſingle conſonant, as in biped, tripod, &c. the antepenultimate accent has a greater tendency to ſhorten the vowel it falls upon.—See Bigamy and Tripod. (503).

Having two correſpondent parts.

☞ Every orthoëpiſt has the accent on the firſt ſyllable of this word but Entick, who places it on the ſecond; but a conſiderable difference is found in the quantity of the firſt and laſt i. Sheridan and Scott have them both long, Nares the laſt long, Perry both ſhort, and Buchanan and W. Johnſton as I have given it. The varieties of quantity on this word are the more ſurpriſing, as all theſe writers that give the ſound of the vowels make the firſt i in tripartite ſhort, and the laſt long; and this uniformity in the pronunciation of one word ought to have led them to the ſame pronunciation of the other, ſo perfectly ſimilar. The ſhortening power of the antepenultimate accent is evident in both. (503).

☞ Dr. Aſh is the only lexicographer who has inſerted this word; but I think its general uſage entitles it to a place in the language, eſpecially as it has the true adjective termination, and relieves us from the inconvenience to which our language is ſo ſubject, that of having the ſubſtantive and adjective of the ſame form; and though as bombaſt ſtands in Dr. Johnſon, the ſubſtantive has the accent on the laſt ſyllable, and the adjective on the firſt, contrary, I think, to the analogy of accentuation, (494). yet this is but a bungling way of ſupplying the want of different words for different parts of ſpeech.

Round maſs rolled along the ground.

☞ Many reſpectable ſpeakers pronounce this word ſo as to rhyme with howl. Dr. Johnſon, Mr. Elphinſton, and Mr. Perry, declare for it; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Smith, pronounce it as the veſſel to hold liquor. I remember having been corrected by Mr. Garrick for pronouncing it differently; and am upon the whole of opinion, that pronouncing it as I have marked it is the preferable mode, though the leaſt analogical. But as the veſſel has indiſputably this ſound, it is rendering the language ſtill more irregular to give the ball a different one. The inconvenience of this irregularity is often perceived in the word bow; to have the ſame word ſignify different things, is the fate of all languages; but pronouncing the ſame word differently to ſignify different things, is multiplying difficulties without neceſſity. For though it may be alleged, that a different pronunciation of the ſame word to ſignify a different thing is in ſome meaſure remedying the poverty and ambiguity of language, it may be anſwered that it is in reality increaſing the ambiguity by ſetting the eye and ear at variance, and obliging the reader to underſtand the context before he can pronounce the word. It may be urged, that the Greek and Latin languages had theſe ambiguities in words which were only diſtinguiſhable by their quantity or accent. But it is highly probable that the Greek language had a written accent to diſtinguiſh ſuch words as were pronounced differently to ſignify different things, and this is equivalent to a different ſpelling; and though the Latin word lego ſignified either to read or to ſend, according to the quantity with which the firſt ſyllable was pronounced; it was certainly an imperfection in that language, which ought not to be imitated.

☞ Dr. Johnſon derives this word, and, perhaps, juſtly, from Bay-window, or a window forming a bay in the internal part of the room; but preſent cuſtom has univerſally agreed to call theſe windows bow-windows, from the curve, like a bow, which they form by jutting outwards. However original and juſt, therefore, Dr. Johnſon's derivation may be, there is little hope of a conformity to it, either in writing or pronunciation, while there is apparently ſo good an etymology, both for ſenſe and ſound, to ſupport the preſent practice.

☞ I have, in the pronunciation of this word, made the a long and ſlender, as in brace, as I find it in Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnſon, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Scott; and not ſhort as in braſs, as Mr. Sheridan has marked it; and which, I believe, is the prevailing pronunciation in Ireland. For though many compounds ſhorten the vowel in the ſimple, as is ſhewn at large in the Principles of pronunciation, (308) (515), yet I think ſuch words are exceptions as are only diminutives, plurals and feminines.

☞ There is a plauſible derivation of this word from the French Bon Pere, which, ſay the anti-clerical critics, was the toaſt which the Monks gave to the Pope in a full glaſs. The farther a derivation is traced, the better it is liked by the common crowd of critics; but Mr. Elphinſton, who ſaw farther into Engliſh and French etymology than any author I have met with, contents himſelf with deriving this word from the word Bump, which, as a verb, ſignifies the action of ſome heavy body that makes a denſe noiſe, and, as a noun, implies the general effect of ſuch an action on the animal frame, which is a protuberance or ſwelling; and the ſwelling out of the liquor when a glaſs is full ſeems the natural offspring of the ſubſtantive bump.

Dr. Aſh, whoſe etymological knowledge ſeems very extenſive, gives this word the ſame derivation, but tells us that the word Bumpkin is of uncertain etymology; a little attention, however, would, I think, have led him to the ſame origin of this word, as the former; for the heavy and protuberant form of the ruſtics, to whom this word is generally applied, might very naturally generate the appellation.

☞ The general ſound of this word is like the verb to buy; but we not unfrequently hear it pronounced like the verb to be. This latter ſound, however, is only tolerable in colloquial pronunciation, and then only when uſed as a preposition; as when we say, Do you travel by land or by water? But in reading these lines of Pope:

"By land, by water, they renew the charge;
"They stop the chariot, and they board the "barge."

Here we ought to give the word by the sound of the verb to buy.

Whence this variety and inconsistency should arise, it is not easy to determine. Orthodoxy and Apoplexy had sufficiently chalked out the analogy of accentuation in these words. The terminations in axy and exy do not form a species of words which may be called enclitical, like logy and graphy (517), but seem to be exactly under the predicament of those Latin and Greek words, which, when adopted into English by dropping their last syllable, remove the accent at least two syllables higher.—See Academy.

☞ I have in this word departed from Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Kenrick, becauſe I think the beſt uſage has entirely departed from them. About thirty years ago the firſt ſyllable of Chamber was univerſally pronounced ſo as to rhyme with Palm, Pſalm, &c.; but ſince that time it has been gradually narrowing to the ſlender ſound of a in came, fame, &c. and ſeems now to be fully eſtabliſhed in this ſound. This, however, is to be regretted, as it militates with the laws of ſyllabication: there are few words in the language which we cannot ſo divide into parts as to ſhow by this diviſion the quantity of the vowels; this word forms an exception; for mb, being uncombinable conſonants, we cannot end the firſt ſyllable with a; and if we join m to it, the a becomes ſhort, and acquires another ſound. But if two ſuch words as Cam and Bridge could not reſiſt the blind force of cuſtom, which has for ſo many years reduced them to Camebridge, why ſhould we wonder that Chamber and Cambrick, Tinmouth and Yarmouth, ſhould yield to the ſame unrelenting tyrant?

☞ This word, with others of the ſame form, ſuch as range, ſtrange, mange, &c. are, in the weſt of England, pronounced with the ſhort ſound of a in ran, man, &c. The ſame may be obſerved of the a in the firſt ſyllable of angel, ancient, &c. which, in that part of the kingdom, ſounds like the article an; and this, though diſagreeable to a London ear, and contrary to the beſt uſage, which forms the only rule, is more analogical than pronouncing them as if written chainge, ſtrainge, aincient, aingel, &c.; for we find every other vowel in this ſituation ſhort, as revenge, hinge, ſpunge, &c.

"And does the meaneſt chars."
SHAKESPEARE.

In Ireland they ſeem to have retained the genuine pronunciation of this, as well as many other old Engliſh words; I mean that which is agreeable to the orthography, and rhyming with tar. In Engliſh it is generally heard like chair to ſit on, and its compound, char-woman, like chair-woman. Skinner, I know, admits that the word may be derived from the Dutch keeren, to ſweep; and Junius ſpells the word cbare, and tells us the Saxons have the ſame word ſpelled cyrre, ſignifying buſineſs or charge; but be its derivation what it will, either the orthography, or the pronunciation, ought to be altered; for as it ſtands at preſent, it is a ſingular and diſgraceful anomaly.

☞ As this word is perfectly angliciſed by cutting off the a in the Latin Charta, and η in the Greek χαρτης, we ought certainly to naturalize the initial letters by pronouncing them as in charter, charity, &c. but ſuch is our fondneſs for Latin and Greek originals, that we catch at the ſhadow of a reaſon for pronouncing after theſe languages, though in direct oppoſition to the laws of our own. Thus we moſt frequently, if not univerſally, hear this word pronounced as Cart, a carriage, and perfectly like the French Carte.

☞ This word is ſometimes falſely pronounced with the a ſhort, ſo as to rhyme with faſten; but it is exactly under the ſame predicament as the verb to haſte, which, when formed into what is called an inchoative verb, becomes haſten, and with which chaſten is a perfect rhyme.

☞ I have in this word departed from Mr. Sheridan, and ſeveral other ſpeakers, in the ſound of the a in the firſt ſyllable, as no analogy can be clearer than that which prevails in words of this termination, where the antepenultimate accent always ſhortens the vowel. Thus though the a, e, and i, are long in humane, ſerene, and divine, they are ſhort in humanity, ſerenity, and divinity; and unleſs cuſtom clearly forbids, which I do not believe is the caſe, chaſtity ought certainly to have the a as I have marked it.

CHASTLY, tshāste'lĕ. ad.
Without incontinence, purely, without contamination.

☞ In theſe words Dr. Johnſon has very improperly omitted the ſilent e; they ought to be written chaſtely and chaſteneſs.—See Introduction to Rhyming Dictionary, Orthographical Aphoriſm the VIIIth.

CHEERFUL, tsheer'fŭl, or tshēr'fŭl. a.
Gay, full of life, full of mirth; having an appearance of gayety.

☞ This word, like fearful, has contracted an irregular pronunciation that ſeems more expreſſive of the turn of mind it indicates than the long open e, which languiſhes on the ear, and is at war with the ſmartneſs and vivacity of the idea. We regret theſe irregularities, but they are not to be entirely prevented; and as they ſometimes ariſe from an effort of the mind to expreſs the idea more forcibly, they ſhould not be too ſtudiouſly avoided; eſpecially when cuſtom has given them conſiderable currency; which I take to be the caſe with the ſhort pronunciation of the preſent word. Mr. Sheridan and ſome other orthöepiſts ſeem to adopt the latter pronunciation; and W. Johnſton, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, the former; and as this is agreeable to the orthography, it ought, unleſs the other has an evident preference in cuſtom, to be looked upon as the moſt accurate. Others are apt to commit a much greater fault in ſpeaking, which is that of forming an adjective from this word, as if written Cherubimical, or Cherubinical. How hard is the fate of an Engliſhman, who, to

☞ What could induce us to ſo irregular a pronunciation of this word is ſcarcely to be conceived. One would be apt to ſuppoſe that the French firſt imported this porcelain, and that when we purchaſed it of them we called it by their pronunciation of China (Sheen); but being unwilling to drop the a, and deſirous of preſerving the French ſound of i, we awkwardly tranſpoſed theſe ſounds, and turned China into Chainee. This abſurd pronunciation ſeems only tolerable when we apply it to the porcelain of China, or the Oranges, which are improperly called China Oranges; but even in theſe caſes it ſeems a pardonable pedantry to reduce the word to its true ſound.

☞ Scholars have lately diſcovered, that all the nations of Europe have, for many centuries paſt, been erroneous in ſpelling this word with a y inſtead of an e; that is, Chymiſt inſtead of Chemiſt: and if we crave their reaſons, they very gravely tell us, that inſtead of deriving the word from χυμος, juice, or from χεω, χευω, or χυω, to melt, it is more juſtly derived from the Arabic kema, black. But Dr. Johnſon, who very well underſtood every thing that could be urged in favour of the new orthography, has very judiciouſly continued the old; and indeed, till we ſee better reaſons than have yet appeared, it ſeems rather to favour of an affectation of Oriental learning than a liberal deſire to rectify and improve our language. But let the word originate in the Eaſt or Weſt, among the Greeks or Arabians, we certainly received it from our common Linguaducts, (if the word will be pardoned me) the Latin and French, which ſtill retain either the y, or its ſubſtitute i.

Beſides, the alteration produces a change in the pronunciation, which, from its being but ſlight, is the leſs likely to be attended to; and therefore the probability is, that let us write the word as we will, we ſhall ſtill continue to pronounce it the old way; for in no Engliſh word throughout the language does the e ſound like y, or i, ſhort, when the accent is on it.

This improvement, therefore, in our ſpelling, would in all probability, add a new irregularity or our pronunciation, already incumbered with two many. Warburton, in his Edition of Pope's Works, ſeems to have been the firſt writer of note who adopted this mode of ſpelling from Boerhaave, and the German critics; and he ſeems to have been followed by all the inſcriptions on the chymiſts ſhops in the kingdom. But till the voice of the people has more decidedly declared itſelf, it is certainly the moſt eligible to follow Dr. Johnſon and our eſtabliſhed writers in the old orthography.—See Mr. Nares's Engliſh Orthöepy, page 285.

☞ How Dr. Johnſon could be guilty of ſo groſs an overſight as to ſpell this word and its compounds with one d is inconceivable. By the general rule of Engliſh pronunciation, as the word ſtands here, it ought to be pronounced with the o long, the firſt ſyllable rhyming with go, no, and ſo. Falſe and abſurd, however, as this ſpelling is, the veneration I have for Dr. Johnſon's authority, forbids me to alter it in this Dictionary, though I ſhall never follow it in practice. Perhaps the ſame veneration induced Mr. Sheridan to let this word ſtand as he found it in Johnſon. Dr. Kenrick has ventured to inſert another d in the verb; but in the ſubſtantive, derived from the preſent participle Codling, lets it ſtand with one d. Some will be apt to think, that when d ends a ſyllable, and a conſonant follows the d, which begins another, that the buſineſs is done, and that the quantity of the vowel is ſufficiently ſecured; but this is a miſtake. For unleſs we previouſly underſtand the ſimple, the o in the compound, by the general rule, muſt be long. Now the firſt principle of orthography is, that, if poſſible, the letters ſhould of themſelves point out the ſound of the word, without the neceſſity of recurring to etymology to find out the ſound of the letters; and that we ſhould never have recourſe to etymology, but where fixing the ſound would unſettle the ſenſe. Thus Coddling, a kind of apple, ought to be written with double d, both becauſe it determines the ſound of the o, and ſhews its derivation from the verb to Coddle. And Codling, a ſmall cod fiſh, ought to have but one d, becauſe putting two, in order to fix the ſound of o, would confound it with another word. To write Saddler, therefore, with one d, as we frequently ſee it on ſhops, is an error againſt the firſt principles of ſpelling; as, without neceſſity, it obliges us to underſtand the derivation of the word before we are ſure of its ſound. The word Stabling and Stabler, for ſtable-keeper in Scotland, with the word Fabled in Milton, all preſent their true ſound to the eye without knowing their primitives; and this eſſential rule has generated the double conſonant in the particles and verbal nouns, beginning, regretted, complotter, &c. But this rule, rational and uſeful as it is, is a thouſand times violated by an affection of a knowledge of the learned languages, and an ignorant prejudice againſt cluſters of conſonants, as they are called. Thus couple, trouble, double, treble and triple, have ſingle conſonants, becauſe their originals in Latin and French have no more, though double conſonants would fix the ſound of the preceding vowels, and be merely double to the eye.

☞ In scarcely any part of the language does the influence of accent on the sound of the vowels appear more perceptibly than in the prepositional syllables, Col, Com, Con, and Cor. When the accent is on these syllables, in College, Commissary, Conclave, Corrigible, &c. &c. the o has distinctly its short sound. The same may be observed of this o, when the principal accent is on the third syllable, and the secondary accent on the first, (523); as in Colonnade, Commendation, Condescension, Correspondent, &c. &c.: for in this case there is a secondary accent on the first syllable, which preserves the o in its true sound (522); but when the accent is on the second syllable, this vowel slides into a sound like short u, and the words To Collect, To Commit, To Convince, To Corrupt, &c. &c. are heard nearly as if written Cullect, Cummit, Cunvince, Currupt, &c. &c. It is true, that when these words are pronounced alone with deliberation, energy, and precision, the o in the first syllable preserves nearly its true sound; but this seems to slide insensibly into short u the moment we unite these words with others, and pronounce them without premeditation. The deliberate and solemn sound is that which I have given in this dictionary: nor have I made any difference between words where the accent is on the second syllable; and why Mr. Sheridan, and those who have followed him, should in Combust, Commute, Complete, &c. &c. give the sound of short o in from, and in Command, Commit, Commence, &c. &c. give the same letter the sound of short u in drum, I cannot conceive; they are all susceptible of this sound or none, and therefore should all be marked alike. If custom be pleaded for this distinction, it may be observed that this plea is the best in the world when it is evident, and the worst when obscure. No such custom ever fell under my observation; I have always heard the first syllables of compare and compel, of commence and compose, pronounced alike, and have therefore made no distinction between then in this Dictionary. I have given them all the sound of the o in Comma; though I am sensible that, in colloquial pronunciation, they all approach nearer to the short u, and are similar to the same syllables in Comfort, Combat, &c. And it may be laid down as a general rule, without an exception, "that o in an initial syllable, immediately before the accent, and succeeded by two uncombinable consonants, may, in familiar conversation, be pronounced like the same letter in come, done," &c.

☞ The propenſity of the unaccented o to fall into the ſound of ſhort u is no where more perceptible than in the firſt ſyllables of words beginning with col, com, con, or cor, when the accent is on the ſecond ſyllable. Thus the o in to collect and college; in commend and comment; in connect and conſul; in correct and corner, cannot be conſidered as exactly the ſame in all: the o in the firſt word of each of theſe pairs has certainly a different ſound from the ſame letter in the ſecond; and if we appreciate this ſound, we ſhall find it coincide with that which is the moſt nearly related to it, namely the ſhort u. I have not however ventured to ſubſtitute this u, not that I think it incompatible with the moſt correct and ſolemn pronunciation, but becauſe where there is a poſſibility of reducing letters to their radical ſounds without hurting the ear, this radical ſound ought to be the model; and the greater or leſſer departure from it, left to the ſolemnity or familiarity of the occaſion. To foreigners, however, it may not be improper to remark, that it would be always better for them to adopt the u inſtead of o; this will ſecure them from the ſmalleſt impropriety, for natives only can ſeize ſuch nice diſtinctions as ſometimes divide even judges themſelves. Mr. Sheridan was certainly of opinion that this unaccented o might be pronounced like u, as he has ſo marked it in command, commence, commiſſion, and commend; though not in commender; and in compare, though not in comparative; but in almoſt every other word where this o occurs he has given it the ſound it has in conſtant. Mr. Scott has exactly followed Mr. Sheridan in theſe words, and Dr. Kenrick has uniformly marked them all with the ſhort ſound of o. Why Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott ſhould make any difference in the firſt ſyllables of theſe words, where the letters and accent are exactly the ſame, I cannot conceive: theſe ſyllables may be called a ſpecies; and, if the occaſion were not too trifling for ſuch a compariſon, it might be obſerved, that as nature varies in individuals, but is uniform in the ſpecies, ſo cuſtom is ſometimes various in accented ſyllables, which are definitely and ſtrongly marked, but commonly more regular in unaccented ſyllables, by being left, as it were, to the common operation of the organs of pronunciation.—See the words COLLECT and DOMESTIC.

The ſound of the language certainly ſuffers by theſe tranſitions of accent. However, when cuſtom has once decided, we may complain, but muſt ſtill acquieſce. But this verb, like To Comment, would, in proſe, require the accent on the firſt ſyllable as in the noun. Though Akenſide has taken the ſame liberty with this word as Milton had done with that——

☞ Dr Kenrick ſays, this word is ſometimes, but improperly, accented on the firſt ſyllable; but it may be obſerved, that this impropriety is become ſo univerſal that no one, who has the leaſt pretenſion to politeneſs, dares to pronounce it otherwiſe. It is, indeed, to be regretted, that we are ſo fond of Latin originals as enterely to neglect our own; for this word can now have the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, only when it means one who confeſſes his crimes: a ſenſe in which it is ſcarcely ever uſed. Mr. Sheridan and Entick have the accent on the firſt ſyllable of this word, Mr. Scott on the firſt and ſecond; Dr. Johnſon, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, Aſh, Bailey, and Smith, on the ſecond: but notwithſtanding this weight of authority, the beſt uſage is certainly on the other ſide.

Open, known, not concealed.

"This clue thus found unravells all the reſt;
"The proſpect clears, and Clodio ſtands con-
" feſt,"

But that this is a mere compliance with the prejudices of the eye, and that there is not the leaſt neceſſity for departing from the common ſpelling, ſee Principles of Engliſh Pronunciation, No. 360.

Confestly, kŏn-fĕſt′lē. ad.
Indiſputably, properly Confessedly (364)

Confidant, kŏn-fē-dănt′. ſ.
A perſon truſted with private affairs.

☞ This word, very unlike moſt others from the ſame ſource, has been made to alter its French orthography, in order to approach a little nearer to the Engliſh pronunciation of it. Some affected ſpeakers on the ſtage pronounce the firſt ſyllable like cone, as it is marked in the firſt edition of Mr. Sheridan's Dictionary; and this is perfectly of a piece with that affectation which has altered the ſpelling of the laſt. By Dryden and South, as quoted by Dr. Johnſon, we find this word ſpelled like the adjective confident; and it is more than probable that its French pronunciation is but of late date; but ſo univerſal is its uſe at preſent, that a greater mark of ruſticity can not be given than to place the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and to pronounce the laſt dent inſtead of dant.

Common boundary, border, edge.

☞ Dr. Johnſon tells us, that the ſubſtantive confine was formerly pronounced with the accent on the laſt ſyllable. The examples, however, which he gives us from the poets, prove only that it was accented both ways. But, indeed, it is highly probable that this was the caſe; for inſtances are numerous of the propenſity of latter pronunciation to place the accent higher than formerly; and when by this accentuation a noun is to be diſtinguiſhed from a verb, it is not entirely without its uſe (492).

☞ Dr. Kenrick blames Dr. Johnſon for accenting this word on the ſecond ſyllable, when the example he brings from Shakeſpeare accents it on the firſt; but it may be obſerved, that as the verb ought to have the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, the adjective, which is derived from it, ought to have the accent on the ſame ſyllable likewiſe; and the example from Shakeſpeare muſt be looked upon as a poetical licence.

☞ There is a very prevailing propenſity to pronounce this word with the accent on the firſt ſyllable; a propenſity which ought to be checked by every lover of the harmony of language. That very ſingular analogy in our tongue of placing the accent on the laſt ſyllable of the verb, and the firſt of the noun, (492) ſeems to have taken place chiefly for the convenience of forming participles, adverbs, and verbal nouns; which would be inharmonious and difficult to pronounce, if the verb had the accent on the firſt ſyllable. This analogy ſhould teach us to avoid placing the accent on the firſt ſyllable of this and ſimilar verbs, however we may pronounce nouns and adjectives.

☞ Mr. Nares, in his English Orthöepy, page 338, has very properly criticised Dr. Johnson's observation on this word, where he says, 'Dr. Johnson has accented this word on the 'last syllable, and has subjoined this remark,' "anciently accented on the first." 'It is evi- 'dent that the whole article should be re- 'versed: The word should stand with the 'accent on the first, and the remark should 'be, "anciently accented on the last." The justness of these observations will appear from the quotations.

"tract,
"Was fast belock'd in thine."
SHAKESPEARE.

"I did; and his contract with Lady Lucy,
"And his contract by deputy in France."

☞ This and the following word are by Dr. Johnson accented on the second syllable; no doubt from the harshness that must necessarily arise from placing the accent on the first, when so many unaccented syllables are to succeed. But if harmony were to take place, we should never suffer the stress on the first syllable of Contrary, from which these words are formed; but that once admitted, as it invariably is by the best speakers, we should cross the most uniform analogy of our language, if we accented the substantive and the adverb differently from the adjective; and therefore, however harsh they may sound, these words must necessarily have the accent on the first syllable.—See CONTRARY.

☞ The accent is invariably placed on the firſt ſyllable of this word by all correct ſpeakers, and as conſtantly removed to the ſecond by the illiterate and vulgar. When common ears refuſe a ſound, it is a ſtrong preſumption that ſound is not agreeable to the general harmony of the language. The learned often vitiate the natural taſte for their own language by an affected veneration for others; while the illiterate, by a kind of vernacular inſtinct, fall into the moſt analogical pronunciation, and ſuch as is moſt ſuitable to the general turn of the language. Anciently this word was moſt commonly pronounced by the learned, as it is now by the vulgar, with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable; but nothing can be now more firmly eſtabliſhed than the accent on the firſt ſyllable, and the other pronunciation muſt be ſcrupulouſly avoided.—See CONTRARILY.

☞ This word ought to have the accent on the laſt ſyllable, both as it is an adjective, and ſo forms an abſtract ſubſtantive contriteneſs, and as the accent on the firſt ſyllable has a tendency to ſhorten the i in the laſt (140). Accordingly Dr. Johnſon, Mr. Scott, and Bailey, place the accent on the laſt ſyllable; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinſton, Dr. Aſh, W. Johnſton, Perry, Buchanan, and Entick, place it on the firſt, with unqueſtionably the beſt uſage on their ſide.

☞ As the adjective contrite, though contrary to analogy, ſeems to prefer the accent on the firſt ſyllable; contritely and contriteneſs muſt neceſſarily have the accent on the ſame ſyllable. See CONTRARILY.

☞ In the firſt edition of this Dictionary I followed Mr. Sheridan's accentuation of this word upon the firſt ſyllable, as I apprehended it was more agreeable to polite uſage, though leſs agreeable to the ear than the accent on the ſecond; but from a farther enquiry and a review of the authorities for both, I am ſtrongly perſuaded in favour of the latter accentuation. For the former we have Sheridan, Aſh, W. Johnſton, and Entick; and for the latter, Dr. Johnſon, Kenrick, Nares, Scott, Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey. The other accentu-

CONVERSANT, { kŏn'vĕr-sănt. / kŏn-vĕr'sănt. } a. Acquainted with, familiar; having intercourſe with any, acquainted; relating to, concerning.

☞ There are ſuch conſiderable authorities for each of theſe pronunciations as render a deciſion on that ground ſomewhat difficult. Dr. Johnſon, Dr. Aſh, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey, place the accent on the ſecond ſyllable; and Mr. Nares, W. Johnſton, and Entick, accent the firſt. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott place it on both, and conſequently leave it undecided. Analogy ſeems to demand the ſtreſs on the ſecond ſyllable; perhaps not ſo much from the relation the word bears to the verb to convérſe, ſince it may poſſibly be derived from the noun cónverſe, (492), as from the very general rule of accenting words of three ſyllables, that are not ſimples in our language, on the ſecond ſyllable when two conſonants occur in the middle. This rule however is frequently violated in favour of the antepenultimate accent (the favourite accent of our language) as in ággrandize, ámneſty, chárácter, cónvertite, anceſtor, mágiſtrate, próteſtant, &c.; and where there is but one conſonant in the middle, nothing is more common than to find the accent of the diſſyllable verb neglected, and the triſſyllable noun adopting the antepenultimate accent. Thus the words Confident, Preſident, Provident, &c. are not accented like the verbs Confide, Preſide, &c. &c. but are conſidered as ſimples, and follow the general rule; which is, that all ſimples of three ſyllables, with but one conſonant in the middle, have the accent on the firſt, and that the vowel in this ſyllable is ſhort (503). Upon the whole therefore, ſince authorities are ſo equal and analogy ſo precarious, uſage muſt be the umpire; and my obſervation fails me if that which may be called the beſt uſage does not decide in favour of the accent on the firſt ſyllable.

☞ It is highly probable that this ſubſtantive was anciently pronounced like the verb, with the accent on the ſecond ſyllable; but nothing is now better eſtabliſhed than the accent on the firſt. Even the line of Pope, men of the law, that this is the word they uſe inſtead of Cognizance, and conſequently, that the charge againſt them of mutilating that word falls to the ground. But it may be anſwered, that the ſecond ſyllable of theſe words are ſo different as to leave us in no doubt which they make uſe of; and that the words Cognizable, Cognizor, and Cognizee, being pronounced by them without the g, are ſufficient proofs of the juſtneſs of the accuſation.

"Generous cónverſe; a ſoul exempt from pride,"

However rugged with the accent on the firſt ſyllable of this word, cannot with propriety be read otherwiſe.

A medicine that increases the force of the heart, or quickens the circulation; any medicine that increases strength; any thing that comforts, gladdens, and exhilarates.

☞ There is certainly a tendency in the d as well as in the t to slide into a soft hissing sound when preceded by the accent, and followed by a diphthong or a diphthongal vowel, commencing with the sound of e. This is evident by the current pronunciation of immediate, verdure, &c. as if written immejeate, verjure, &c. (294); and this pronunciation is so agreeable to the genius of our language, that the organs slide into it insensibly. Mr. Sheridan, in order to mark this sound, has adopted the y, and spelled the word Cor-dyal; and if y is here articulated as a consonant, as is intended, its connexion with d produces a sound so near the hiss in Cor-je-al, as to be with difficulty distinguished from it.

☞ Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Entick, and Smith, accent this word on the first; and Dr. Kenrick, Scott, Perry, and Bailey, on the second syllable. The weight of authority is certainly for the accentuation I have adopted, and analogy seems to confirm this authority. For as the word is derived from Corollarium, with the accent on the antepenultimate, our pronunciation of this word generally lays an additional accent on the first syllable, which, when the word is shortened by dropping a syllable in Corollary, becomes the principal accent, as in a thousand other instances.—See Academy.

☞ In the pronunciation of this word and its compounds, Mr. Sheridan has adopted a vulgariſm, of which one could ſcarcely have ſuſpected him. But pronouncing covetſbus for covetous is not only a vulgariſm, but contrary to analogy. All thoſe diphthongs and diphthongal vowels which draw the preceding conſonants to aſpiration are ſuch as commence with the ſound of e; which, from its nearneſs to the ſound of double e, and the nearneſs of this ſound to the commencing ſound of y, approaches to the hiſſing ſound of ſ, z, and ſoft c, and in the abſence of accent coaleſces with them. T and D being formed in the ſame ſeat of ſound as the ſ, z, and ſoft c, when the accent is before them, eaſily ſlide into the ſame ſound before ſimilar vowels, but never before any other. For we might with as much propriety pronounce calamitous and neceſſitous, calamitſbus and neceſſitſbus, as covetous, covetſbus. (459).

This pronunciation is adopted only by Dr. Aſh and Buchanan, while Dr. Johnſon, Mr. Elphinſton, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, W. Johnſton, Kenrick, Entick, and Bailey, are uniformly for the accent on the laſt ſyllable.

But however this may be, it ſeems too firmly fixed in its ſound of Cowcumber to be altered, and muſt be claſſed with its irregular fellow eſculent Aſparagus, which ſee.

Thus, the firſt u in Cuminum being ſhort, they doubled the m to indicate that ſhortneſs; as the analogy of our language would infallibly pronounce the u long, if the conſonant were ſingle in the ſame manner as in Cubic, Cupid, &c.—See DRAMA.

☞ I have in this word differed from Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Johnſon, by placing the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable inſtead of the penultimate. I know that Greek words of this termination have the accent on the penultimate ſyllable; but the antepenultimate accentuation is more agreeable to the genius of our tongue, and ſeems to have prevailed. For though Dr. Johnſon has given this word the penultimate accent, he has placed the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable of Ambroſia, Euthanaſia, and Hydrophobia, though theſe have all the accent on the penultimate in the Greek. The pronunciation I have adopted I ſee is ſupported by Dr. Kenrick, Entick, Scott, Perry, and Buchanan, which abundantly ſhows the general current of cuſtom.

To theſe obſervations may be added, that if the i be accented, it muſt neceſſarily have the long open ſound, as in Elegiac, and not the ſound of e, as Mr. Sheridan has marked it.

☞ I have, in the firſt ſyllable of this word, contrary to Mr. Sheridan, preferred the ſhort to the long ſound of y. My firſt reaſon is, that this letter in Greek is the ſame as in Cynic and Cylinder; both which have the y ſhort. The next reaſon is, the very general rule in our language of pronouncing the vowel ſhort in all ſimples which have the accent on the antepenultimate ſyllable. (535) (537) (503). " But oh what damned minutes tells he o'er,
" Who dotes, yet doubts—ſuſpects, yet ſtrongly

There is a very ſingular uſage of this word, as a verb or participle, when it ſignifies the condemnation of a play; but this application of it, though authorized by the politeſt ſpeakers, has an unhallowed harſhneſs in it to pious ears, and an affectation of force to judicious ones.

That this is contrary to univerſal uſage in England, and to the moſt general rule in the language, needs not be inſiſted on; the only word of a ſimilar form which is ſo pronounced, is the firſt perſon plural of the verb to be But this, it muſt be remembered, is an auxiliary verb; and the auxiliary verbs being as irregular in their pronunciation as in their form, are but indifferent models by which to regulate the reſt of the language.

☞ An uneducated Engliſh ſpeaker is very apt to pronounce this word with the accent on the firſt ſyllable, according to the analogy of his own language; but a learned ear would be as much ſhocked at ſuch a daparture from claſſical propriety, as in the words ſonorous and canorous (512). When once the mere Engliſh ſcholar is ſet right in this word he will be ſure to pronounce Dedecorus with the accent on the penultimate; and when he is told that this wrong, becauſe that ſyllable in the Latin word is ſhort, he will not fail to pronounce Indecorous with the antepenultimate accent; but what will be his ſuprize when he is informed that this too is wrong, becauſe the penultimate ſyllable in Latin is ſhort! —See INDECOROUS.

☞ All our lexicographers, except Dr. Johnſon, place the accent on the ſecond ſyllable of this word; and this accentuation, it muſt be confeſſed, is agreeable to the beſt uſage. But Dr. Johnſon's accentuation on the firſt ſyllable is unqueſtionably the moſt agreeable to Engliſh analogy; firſt, becauſe it is a triſyllable and a ſimple, (503); next, becauſe it is derived from Decretatis; which, in our pronunciation of it, has an accent on the firſt and third ſyllable; and therefore, when adopted into our language, by dropping the laſt ſyllable, takes the accent on the firſt. See Academy. That this is the general analogy of accenting words from the Latin which drop the laſt ſyllable, is evident from the words Decrement, Increment, Interval, &c.

Dr. Johnſon and the reſt are decidedly for the general pronunciation, which is the ſame as the verb to defile: and if this were urged as a reaſon to alter the pronunciation of the ſubſtantive, it may be anſwered, that the remedy would be worſe than the diſeaſe.—See Bowl.

☞ There is a general rule in pronunciation, viz. when a vowel ends a ſyllable immediately before the accent, that vowel has a tendency to lengthen, and is often, particularly in ſolemn ſpeaking, pronounced as open as if the accent were on it. See To COLLECT. (544).—This general tendency inclines us to divide words in ſuch a manner as to make the vowel end the unaccented ſyllable: and if the two ſucceeding conſonants are combinable, to carry them both to that ſyllable which has the accent. When the e is thus left to finiſh the ſyllable before the accent in de-ſpair, de-ſpatch, &c. it inclines to its open ſlender ſound, which, being rapidly pronounced, falls into the ſhort i, which is exactly its ſhort ſound (105) (107); for when the e is ſhort by being cloſed by a conſonant, like other vowels, it goes into a different ſound from the long one (544). Thus the word deſpatch, till Dr. Johnſon corrected it, was always written with an i; and now it is corrected, we do not find the leaſt difference in the pronunciation.

An inſeparable particle uſed in compoſition, implying commonly a privative or negative ſignification of the word to which it is joined; as to arm, to diſarm; to join, to diſjoin; &c.

☞ When the accent, either primary or ſecondary, is on this inſeparable prepoſition, the s is always ſharp and hiſſing; but when the accent is on the ſecond ſyllable, the s will be either hiſſing or buzzing, according to the nature of the conſecutive letter. That is, if a ſharp mute, as p, t, &c. ſucceed, the preceding s muſt be pronounced ſharp and hiſſing, as diſpoſe, diſtaſte, &c.; but if a flat mute as b, d, &c. or a vowel or a liquid begin the next ſyllable, the foregoing s muſt be ſounded like z, as diſburſe, diſdain, &c.; but if the ſecondary accent be on this inſeparable prepoſition, (523), as in diſbelief, &c. the s retains its pure hiſſing ſound. Diſmal, which ſeems to be an objection to the firſt part of this rule, is in reality a confirmation of it; for the firſt ſyllable in this word is not a prepoſition, but a contraction of the Latin word dies; and diſmal is evidently derived from dies malus. For want of this clue, Mr. Sheridan has given the s pure, to diſgrace, diſguiſe, &c.

☞ This word and its companion Concrete one would have ſuppoſed ſhould have the ſame accentuation in all our Pronouncing Dictionaries, and yet ſcarcely any two words are more differently accented. The accent is placed on the laſt ſyllable of Concrete by Dr. Aſh, Buchanan, Perry, Entick, and Bailey; and on the firſt by Sheridan, Dr. Johnſon, Smith, W. Johnſton, and Dr. Kenrick. Scott accents the laſt ſyllable of this word when an adjective, and the firſt when a ſubſtantive, a diſtinction very agreeable to analogy, (494); but Entick, directly contrary to this analogy, reverſes this order. Diſcrete is always uſed as an adjective, but has ſcarcely leſs diverſity of accentuation than Concrete. Dr. Johnſon, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Perry, and Entick, accent it on the laſt ſyllable; and Dr. Aſh, Mr. Sheridan, and Bailey, on the firſt. When I wrote the Rhyming Dictionary I accented both theſe words on the firſt ſyllable; but this accentuation I imagine aroſe from contraſting them, which often places the accent on the oppoſing parts, as in in'ternal and ex'ternal; but upon maturer conſideration I apprehend the accent ought to be placed on the firſt ſyllable of Concrete when a ſubſtantive, and on the laſt of both words when adjectives.

DOLOUR, dō'lŭr. s. (314).
Grief, sorrow; lamentation, complaint.
☞ Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Elphinston, and Entick, make the first o in this word short, as in Dollar; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and Dr. Ash, long, as in Donor: the latter is, in my opinion, the most analogical. (542).

DOMAIN, dō-māne'. s.

DOME, dōme. s.

☞ There is a strong propensity, particularly in the people of London, to pronounce this word so as to rhyme with room; but this is contrary to all our Dictionaries which give the sound of the vowels, and ought not to be suffered to add to the already too numerous exceptions to the general sound of o.

DOMESTICAL, dō-mĕs'tĕ-kăl. } a.
DOMESTICK, dō-mĕs'tĭk. }

☞ Dr. Johnson observes, that of English, as of all living tongues, there is a double pronunciation, one cursory and colloquial, the other regular and solemn. He gives no instances of this double pronunciation; and it is at first a little difficult to conceive what are the words in which this observation is verified. Solemn speaking seems to have no effect upon the accented vowels; for let us pronounce them as rapidly or as solemnly as we will, we certainly do not make any change in the quantity or quality of them. The only part of the language in which Dr. Johnson's observation seems true, is some of the vowels when unaccented; and of these the o seems to undergo the greatest change in consequence of solemnity or rapidity. Thus the o in obey is, in solemn speaking, pronounced as long and full as in the first syllable of open, ; but in rapid and cursory speaking, as short as the o in oven. This latter sound, however, must not be given as a model; for let the pronunciation be ever so rapid and familiar, there is a certain elegance in giving the o, in this situation, its full, open sound, approaching to that which it has when under the accent; and though nothing but a delicacy of ear will direct us to the degree of openness with which we must pronounce the unaccented o in Domestic, Docility, Potential, Proceed, Monastic, Monotony, &c. we may be assured that these vowels are exactly under the same predicament; and can never be pronounced short and shut, as if written Dommestick, Dossility, Pottential, &c. Without hurting the ears of every good speaker, and overturning the first principles of pronunciation. (547) (548).
The same observations seem to hold good of the unaccented a in every word ending in ory; as transitory, dilatory, &c. The o in rapid speaking certainly goes into ſhort u, as if written tranſitury, dilatury, &c.; but in ſolemn pronunciation approaches to the accented, open ſound of o in glory, ſtory, &c. but as the o in theſe terminations never admits of being pronounced quite ſo open as when ending a ſyllable before the accent, I have, like Mr. Sheridan, given it the colloquial ſound of ſhort u. (512).—See COMMAND.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnſton, and Entick, in the quantity of the vowel in the firſt ſyllable of this word, not only as I think it contrary to the beſt uſage, but as it is at variance with the analogy of words in this termination. Let not the long quantity of the Latin o in Donatio be pleaded in favour of my opponents; for, waving the utter uncertainty of arguing from the Latin quantity to ours, this would prove that the a and e in the firſt ſyllable of Sanative and Lenitive ought to be long likewiſe. Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Aſh, and Mr. Perry, are on my ſide.

☞ The laſt mode of pronouncing this word is, that which was univerſally current till within theſe few years; but the firſt has inſenſibly ſtolen into uſe, as we may obſerve from the ſeveral Dictionaries which have adopted it. Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnſton, Mr. Nares, and, as far as we can judge by the poſition of the accent, Entick and Bailey pronounce it with the firſt a long; and Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, and, if we may gueſs at Dr. Aſh by his accent, with the ſame letter ſhort. Mr. Scott gives both ways; but by placing the ſound with the long a firſt, ſeems to prefer it. The authorities are certainly on the ſide I have adopted; but I wiſh alſo to eſtabliſh it by analogy.

And firſt it may be obſerved, that if any argument can be drawn from the Latin quantity to the Engliſh, it is certainly in favour of the firſt pronunciation: for in a Latin word of two ſyllables, where a conſonant comes between two vowels, the conſonant always goes to the laſt, and the firſt vowel is pronounced long, without the leaſt regard to the quantity. Thus Crātes, the philoſopher, and crātes, a hurdle; dēcus, honour, and dēdo, to give; ŏvo, to triumph, and ōvum, an egg; Nŭma, the legiſlator, and Nūmen, the divinity, have the firſt vowels always ſounded long by an Engliſh ſpeaker, although in the Latin the firſt vowel in the firſt word of each of theſe pairs is ſhort. From this univerſal manner of pronouncing Latin words, though contrary to Latin quantity, it is no wonder when we adopt words from that language without any alteration, we ſhould pronounce them in the ſame manner; and it may be fairly concluded, that this uniform pronunciation of the Latin ariſes from the genius of our own tongue; which always inclines us to lengthen the accented vowel before a ſingle conſonant in words of two ſyllables; otherwiſe, what reaſon can we aſſign for the rule laid down by our anceſtors for doubling the conſonant in verbs, verbal nouns and participles, where a ſingle vowel was preceded by a ſingle conſonant in the theme? But an affectation of Latinity ſeems to have diſturbed the general pronunciation of our own language, as much as our own pronunciation has diſturbed the Latin quantity. For though we neglect the quantity of Latin diſſyllables, when we are pronouncing that language, yet in diſſyllables of our own, formed from the Latin, and anglicifed, we ſeem to be, in ſome meaſure, guided by the Latin quantity. To what elſe can we attribute the ſhort ſound of the firſt vowel in magic, placid, tepid, vigil, novel, &c.; and to what but the genuine force of vernacular pronunciation can we aſcribe the long ſound of u in this ſituation, let the quantity of the Latin original be what it will? Thus, though epic, topic, cynic, and tonic, have the firſt vowel ſhort, tunic, ſtupid, Cupid, tumid, &c. have the u long, though always ſhort in the Latin words from whence they are derived. But however this may be in words anglicifed from the Latin, and ending in a conſonant, perhaps, in nothing is our pronunciation more regular than in the quantity of the firſt vowel in a word of two ſyllables ending with a vowel; in this caſe the firſt vowel is invariably long, and why the word in queſtion ſhould be the only exception cannot eaſily be accounted for. We have no words originally Engliſh of this form; but thoſe we adopt from other languages ſufficiently ſhew the analogy of pronunciation: thus Gola, Coma, China, Era, Strata, Quota, Fico, Dado, Sago, Bravo, Tyro, Hero, Negro, &c. &c. have all the firſt ſyllable long; and why Drama ſhould not fall into the ſame analogy I cannot conceive. A corroboration of this is the pronunciation of Lama, Brama, Zama, and Zara, and all proper names of the ſame form from the Greek and Latin, as Cato, Plato, Strato, Crito, Draco, &c.; and I think it may be with confidence aſſerted, that an Engliſhman, who had never heard the word Drama pronounced, would naturally place the accent upon the firſt ſyllable, and pronounce the vowel in that ſyllable long and ſlender. See ACADEMY, INCOMPARABLE, &c. A collateral proof too that this is the true pronunciation is, that MESENTERY, a word of the same form, is by all the above-mentioned lexicographers who have the word, except Bailey, accented on the first syllable.

☞ This word, though long in uſe, is not yet naturalized. Every ſyllable but the laſt may be perfectly pronounced by an Engliſhman who does not ſpeak French; but this ſyllable having a naſal vowel, not followed by hard e or g, (ſee ENCORE,) is an inſuperable difficulty: the neareſt ſound to it would perhaps be to make it rhyme with long and ſtrong. But a ſpeaker would, perhaps, riſk leſs by pronouncing it like an Engliſh word at once than to imitate the French ſound awkwardly.

☞ Good Speakers ſeem divided about the quantity of the vowel in the firſt ſyllable of this word. Kenrick, Perry, and Buchanan, make it ſhort; and Sheridan, Nares, Entick, Aſh, Scott, and W. Johnſton, long. This majority has induced me to make it long likewiſe, and not any length of the ſame letter in the Latin edictum; for though the Latin accent is frequently a rule for the placing of ours, the quantity of Latin has almoſt as little to do with our quantity as it has with that of the Chineſe or Hebrew. ☞ The ſtrong tendency of the vowel to open, when it terminates a ſyllable, immediately before the accent, makes us frequently hear the e in theſe words, when the accent is on the ſecond ſyllable, pronounced as open as if there were but one f. The ſame may be obſerved of the o in occaſion, offence, official, &c. This is certainly a deviation from rule; but it is ſo general, and ſo agreeable to the ear, as to be a diſtinguiſhing mark of elegant pronunciation.

☞ Contrary to my own judgement I have made the e in the firſt ſyllable of this word long, becauſe I ſee it is uniformly ſo marked by all the Dictionaries I have ſeen: but I am much miſtaken if analogy does not in time recover her rights, and ſhorten this vowel by joining it to the g, as if written eg-o-tiſm; not becauſe this vowel is ſhort in the Latin ego, (for the Engliſh quantity has very little to do with the Latin) but becauſe the word may be looked upon as a ſimple in our language, and the accent is on the antepenultimate ſyllable. Mr. Elphinſton, whoſe opinion in this point is of the greateſt weight, makes the firſt vowel ſhort. See Principles, No. 511, 530, 536.

Twice four. A word of number.

☞ The genuine ſound of the diphthong in this word and its compounds does not ſeem to be that of the firſt ſound of a, which Mr. Sheridan has given it under the ſecond ſound of e; but a combination of the firſt ſound of a and e pronounced as cloſely together as poſſible. But as this diſtinction is very delicate, and may not be more eaſily apprehended than that between meat and meet, (246), I have given the diphthong the ſame ſound as Mr. Sheridan has done.

EIGHTH, āyt*th*. a.
Next in order to the ſeventh.

☞ This word as it is written, by no means conveys the ſound annexed to it in ſpeaking: for the abſtract termination th being a perfect liſp, is quite diſtinct from the final t of eight, and can never coaleſce with it without depriving the word of one of its letters. The only ſound conveyed by the letters of this word, as now ſpelt, is, as if written ayth: and if we would ſpell this ſound as we pronounce it, and as the analogy of formation certainly requires, we muſt neceſſarily write it eighth. This would have an unuſual appearance to the eye; and this would be a ſufficient reaſon with the multitude for oppoſing it; but men of ſenſe ought to conſider, that the credit of the language is concerned in rectifying this radical fault in its orthography.

☞ Our own analogy would lead us to place the accent upon the ſecond ſyllable of this word; but its derivation from the Latin elegiacus, and the Greek ἐλεγειακὸς, (in both which the antepenultimate is long), obliges us, under pain of appearing groſsly illiterate, to place the accent on the ſame letter. But it may be obſerved, that we have ſcarcely an inſtance in the whole language of adopting a Latin or Greek word, and curtailing it of a ſyllable, without removing the accent higher on the Engliſh word. The French ſeem to have been the firſt who uſed it in this ſenſe: Addiſon has followed them; and as it is perfectly agreeable to the Latin original e and loquor, and ſerves to diſtinguiſh oratorical pronunciation from pronunciation in general, the alteration is not without its uſe.

☞ The affinity between the long e and the ſhort i, when immediately followed by the accent, has been obſerved under the word Deſpatch. But this affinity is no where more remarkable than in thoſe words where the e is followed by m or n. This has induced Mr. Sheridan to ſpell embrace, endow, &c. imbrace, indow, &c. and this ſpelling may, perhaps, ſufficiently convey the curſory or colloquial pronunciation; but my obſervation greatly fails me if correct public ſpeaking does not preſerve the e in its true ſound, when followed by m or n. The difference is delicate, but, in my opinion, real.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan, and Buchanan, in the pronunciation of the laſt ſyllable of this word; as I think the long ſound of i is more agreeable to the ear, as well as to the beſt uſage, though I confeſs not ſo analogical as the ſhort i. Dr. Kenrick, Scott, W. Johnſton, and Perry, pronounce the i long as I have done. See UMPIRE.

EMPIRICK, ĕm'pē-rĭk, or ĕm-pīr'ĭk. ſ.
A trier or experimenter, ſuch perſons as venture upon obſervation only; a quack.

☞ Dr. Johnſon tells us, the firſt accentuation is adopted by Dryden, and the laſt by Milton; and this he prefers. There is indeed a ſtrong analogy for the laſt, as the word ends in ic, (509); but this analogy is ſometimes violated in favour of ſubſtantives, as in Lunatic, Heretic, &c.; and that this is the caſe in the word in queſtion, may be gathered from the majority of votes in its favour. For though Dr. Johnſon, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, and W. Johnſton, are for the latter; Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Aſh, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Entick, Bailey, and Barclay, are for the former. This word claſſes too with thoſe that almoſt always adopt the antepenultimate accent, (503); but the adjective has more properly the accent on the ſecond ſyllable.

☞ This word, before Dr. Johnſon's Dictionary was publiſhed, was always written Impoveriſh; nor ſince he has reformed the orthography do we find any conſiderable difference in the ſound of the firſt ſyllable, except in ſolemn ſpeaking; in this caſe, we muſt undoubtedly preſerve the e in its true ſound. ☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the ſound of the y in the ſecond ſyllable of this word, merely from the diſagreeable effect it has on the ear, to pronounce two vowels of exactly the ſame ſound in immediate ſucceſſion. This ſameneſs is, in ſome meaſure, avoided by giving y the long diphthongal ſound of i; and the ſame reaſon has induced me to the ſame notation in the word Empyrean. If good uſage is againſt me, I ſubmit.

☞ This word has the accent on the penultimate ſyllable in Sheridan, Kenrick, Barclay, Nares, and Bailey; and on the antepenultimate in Aſh, Buchanan, Perry, and Entick; and this accentuation is, in my opinion, the moſt correct; for as the penultinate is ſhort, there is the ſame reaſon for placing the accent on the antepenultimate as in Cerulean. ☞ Though in cursory speaking we frequently hear the e confounded with the short i in the first syllables of encamp, enchant, &c. without any great offence to the ear, yet such an interchange in encomium, encomiast, &c. is not only a departure from propriety, but from politeness; and it is not a little surprising that Mr. Sheridan should have adopted it. To ENCOMPASS, ĕn-kŭm'pās. v. a. To enclose, to encircle; to go round any place.

ENCORE, ŏng-kōre'. ad. Again, once more.

☞ This word is perfectly French, and, as usual, we have adopted it with the original pronunciation. In other words which we have received from the French, where the nasal vowel has occurred, we have substituted an awkward pronunciation in imitation of it, which has at once shewn our fondness for foreign modes of speaking, and our incapacity of acquiring them: thus Caisson has been turned into Cassoon, Ballon into Balloon, Dragon into Dragoon, and Chamont (a character in the Orphan) into Shamoon; but in the word before us, this nasal sound is followed by c hard, which after n always involves hard g (408); and this is precisely an English sound. An Englishman, therefore, does not find the difficulty in pronouncing the nasal sound in this word, which he would in another that does not admit of the succeeding hard c or g; as entendement, attentif, &c.; for if in pronouncing the en in these words the tongue should once touch the roof of the mouth, the French nasal sound would be ruined. No wonder then that a mere English speaker should pronounce this French word so well, and the rest of the nasal vowels so ill. It does not arise from the habit they contract at Theatres, (where it would be the most barbarous and ill-bred pronunciation in the world to call for the repetition of an English song in plain English). It does not, I say, arise from custom, but from coincidence. The sound, in the word before us, is common to both nations; and though the French may give it a somewhat lighter sound than the English, they are both radically the same. Adopting this word, however, in the Theatre, does the English no manner of credit. Every language ought to be sufficient for all its purposes. A foreigner who understood our language, but who had never been present at our dramatic performances, would suppose we had no equivalents in English, should he hear us cry out Encore, Bravo, and Bravissimo, when we only wish to have a song repeated, or to applaud the agility of a dancer.

☞ Before Johnſon publiſhed his Dictionary, theſe words were univerſally ſpelt indict and indite. That great reformer of our language ſeems to have conſidered, that as the Latin Indicere came to us through the French enditer, we ought to adopt the French rather than the Latin preposition, eſpecially as we have conformed to the French in the ſound of the latter part of this word. But notwithſtanding his authority, to indict, ſignifying to charge, ſtands its ground, and to indite is uſed only when we mean to draw up or compoſe; in this ſenſe, perhaps, it may not be improper to ſpell it endite, as it may ſerve to diſtinguiſh it from the other word, ſo different in ſignification.

manner by thoſe who can pronounce French, and by thoſe who cannot the e is changed into an o. Sometimes a mere Engliſhman attempts to give the naſal vowel the French ſound, and expoſes himſelf to laughter by pronouncing g after it, as if written ongvelope. This is as ridiculous to a polite ear as if he pronounced it, as it ought to be pronounced, like the verb to envelop.

☞ This word is in general uſe, and ought to be pronounced like the Engliſh verb to environ: but the vanity of appearing polite keeps it ſtill in the French pronunciation; and as the naſal vowels in the firſt and laſt ſyllable are not followed by hard e or g, it is impoſſible for a mere Engliſhman to pronounce it faſhionably. See ENCORE.

But as Æquivalens and Æquivocus have the accent on the antepenultimate in Latin and Æquipollens on the penultimate, and the number of ſyllables being the ſame in both languages, the accent is generally on the ſame ſyllable, (503).

☞ This word, from its being almoſt antiquated, has eſcaped the criticiſm of all our orthöepiſts, except Mr. Elphinſton, who contends that it ought to be pronounced as if written eſkew. "No wonder eſkew, (he "ſays), often falſely articulated becauſe falſely "exhibited eſchew, was ocularly traced from "the old eſcheoir (afterwards echoir) to de"volve or eſcheat, rather than from eſquiver, "to parry, avoid or eſkew; by thoſe to whom "the body of the child and the ſoul of the "parent were equally unknown." The etymological abilities of this gentleman in the French and Engliſh languages are unqueſtionable; but the pronunciation of this word ſeems fixed to its orthography; and beyond the reach of etymology to alter. When an orthography and pronunciation have obtained for a long time, though by a falſe title, it is perhaps better to leave them in quiet poſſeſſion, than to diſturb the language by an ancient, though perhaps better claim.

To EXAGGERATE, ĕgz-ădje'ĕ-rāte.
v. a. To heighten by repreſentation.

☞ This word is ſometimes heard with the double g hard, as in dagger; but every one who has a ſcrap of Latin knows, that exaggerate comes from exaggero, and that all words from that language have the g ſoft before e and i; the third ſyllable, therefore, muſt have the e ſoft. But it will be ſaid, that, according to the laws of pronunciation, the firſt g ought to be hard, as the firſt c is in flaccid fiecity, &c. To which it may be anſwered, that, ſtrictly ſpeaking, it ought to be ſo; but polite uſage has ſo fixed the firſt, as well as the laſt g in the ſoft ſound, that none but a confirmed pedant would have the boldneſs to pronounce them differently.

This uſage too we find is not without all foundation in analogy. Wherever there is a conſiderable difficulty keeping ſounds ſeparate, they will infallibly run into each other. This is obſervable in the ſound of s, which, when final, always adopts the ſound of z when a flat conſonant precedes, (434); the firſt s likewiſe in the terminations ſeſſion, miſſion, &c. neceſſarily runs in the ſound of sh like laſt s: but it may be ſaid, that the firſt g in Exaggerate has no ſuch relation to the ſecond as s has to sh; and that this very difference between the two conſonants makes us preſerve the firſt c in flaccid and ſiccity in its hard ſound of k, which is perfectly diſtinct from the other ſound of c, which is nothing more than s. To this it can only be replied by way of mitigation, that hard g and ſoft g or j are formed nearer together in the mouth than hard c or k and ſoft c or s; and therefore as they are more liable to coaleſce, their coaleſcence is more excuſable.

☞ The firſt ſyllable of this word (ſtrictly ſpeaking) ought to be pronounced according to the rule laid down under the prepoſition Ex: but in this pronunciation we totally loſe the ſharp s which commences the Latin word ſicco, to dry; of which this word is compounded, and thus the ſound of the word is radically injured, and its etymology loſt. But it will be ſaid, the Latins made the ſame exciſion of the radical s on account of its coincidence with the s contained in the x of the prepoſition, and wrote the word exicco. It is allowed theſe corruptions obtained amongſt them, as amongſt us; though it is doubtful whether the ſame inconvenience aroſe amongſt them in this word as with us: for Voſſius makes it highly probable that the Latins never gave the flat ſound egz to the letter x; and the beſt manuſcripts inform us, that writing this word with an x, as exſicco, and thus preſerving the compoſition diſtinct and perfect, is the moſt accurate orthography.

☞ The a in this word ſeems floating between long and ſhort quantity, as it was in the Latin Fabrica. I have, like Mr. Sheridan, made it ſhort; for though Latin words of two ſyllables, when adopted into Engliſh, always have the accent on the firſt, and the vowel generally long, as baſis, focus, quota, &c.; when words of three ſyllables in Latin, with but one conſonant in the middle, are angliciſed by reducing them to two ſyllables; as the penultimate in ſuch Latin words is generally ſhort, and the accent of conſequence antepenultimate, the firſt vowel in the Engliſh word is generally ſhort from the ſhortening power of the antepenultimate accent in our pronunciation of the Latin word from whence it is derived; thus the Latin Mimicus, reduced to the Engliſh Mimic, has the firſt vowel ſhort, though long in Latin, becauſe we think it ſhort in our pronunciation of Latin: the ſame may be obſerved of the words florid, vivid, and livid, from the Latin floridus, vividus, and lividus. Thus, though Fabrica, might have the firſt vowel long in Latin, yet as we always pronounce it ſhort in the Engliſh pronunciation of that language, ſo when it is reduced to the Engliſh Fabric it ſeems agreeable to this uſage to make the firſt ſyllable ſhort.

Authority ſeems likewiſe to favour this pronunciation; for Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinſton, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and, as far as we can judge by the poſition of the accent, Bailey are for the a ſhort; and Buchanan, W. Johnſton, and, if we can gueſs by accent, Dr. Aſh and Entick, for the long a. See Principles, No. 544.

☞ Dr. Johnſon has placed the accent on the laſt ſyllable both of this word and Jocund; in which he is conſiſtent, but contrary both to cuſtom and to Engliſh analogy. Mr. Sheridan places the accent on the firſt ſyllable of Jocund, and on the laſt of this word. The reaſons are the ſame for accenting both; they both come from the Latin, facundus and jocundus; and there is ſcarcely a more invariable rule in our language than that of removing the accent higher when we adopt a word from the Latin, and abridge it of its latter ſyllables. FAREWELL { fāre'wĕl, or fāre-wĕl' / fār'wĕl, or fār-wĕl' }
The parting compliment, adieu; it is ſometimes uſed only as an expreſſion of ſeparation without kindneſs.

☞ To all theſe different pronunciations is this word ſubject. The accentuation, either on the firſt or laſt ſyllable, depends much on the rhythm of the ſentence. See Commodore and Commonwealth.

When it is uſed as a ſubſtantive, without an adjective before it, the accent is generally on the firſt ſyllable, as,

" See how the morning opes her golden gates,
" And takes her fárewell of the glorious ſun."
SHAKESP.

Or if the adjective follow the ſubſtantive, as,

" If chance the radiant ſun with fárewell ſweet
" Extend his ev'ning beam, the fields revive,
" The birds their notes renew, and bleating herds
" Atteſt their joy, that hill and valley ring."
MILTON.

But if the adjective precede the ſubſtantive, the accent is generally placed on the laſt ſyllable, as,

Treading the path to nobler ends,
A long farewéll to love I gave."
WALLER.

" As in this grove I took my laſt farewéll."
DRYDEN.

Or when it is governed by a verb, as, " I bade " him farewéll," or " I bade farewéll to " him."

When it is uſed as an adjective the accent is always on the firſt ſyllable, as " A fárewell " Sermon."

But when it is uſed as an interjection (for with great deference to Dr. Johnſon I cannot think it an adverb) the accent is either on the firſt or ſecond ſyllable, as the rhythm of pronunciation ſeems to require.

" But fárewell, king; ſith thus thou will appear,
" Freedom lives hence, and Baniſhment is here."
SHAKESP.

——" O, queen, farewéll; be ſtill poſſeſt
" Of dear remembrance, bleſſing ſtill and bleſt."
POPE.

With reſpect to the pronunciation of a, in the firſt ſyllable of this word, Mr. Sheridan ſays, that in England the firſt ſyllable is pronounced like far, and in Ireland like fare. But if this be really the caſe the two nations ſeem to have changed dialects; for nothing can be more evident to the moſt ſuperficial obſerver, than the tendency in Ireland to pronounce the a in the firſt manner, and in England in the latter. Not that I think the pronunciation of the firſt ſyllable of farewell, like far, either vicious or vulgar: I am convinced many good ſpeakers ſo pronounce it; but the other pronunciation I think the more eligible, as well as more general. Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Scott pronounce it with the ſecond ſound of a, and W. Johnſton and Mr. Perry with the firſt.

☞ Dr. Johnſon tells us, that the l in this word is ſometimes ſounded and ſometimes mute, and that in converſation it is generally ſuppreſſed. To this Dr. Kenrick adds, that it is needleſsly ſuppreſſed. None of our lexicographers have marked this letter mute but Mr. Sheridan. Mr. Nares ſays, the word is pronounced both ways, and leaves it undetermined; but Mr. Elphinſton decides poſitively againſt retaining the l even in writing: his reaſons are, that as the French have left out the l in their antiquated faulte, we ought to leave it out of our Engliſh word which was derived from their ancient one. This reaſoning, however, I think is not concluſive. If after deriving words from the living languages, and uſing them for centuries, we were to alter them as the parent language happened to alter, our own language would have no ſtability. The truth is, the French language is much more altered within the laſt two centuries than the Engliſh, and is greatly enfeebled by dropping its conſonants. Its naſal vowels too have added to its weakneſs by rendering both vowels and conſonants leſs diſtinct. The l in queſtion has nothing harſh or uncommon in its ſound, and, if it were mute, would deſert its relation to the Latin falſitas, and form a diſgraceful exception; and if poets have ſometimes diſmiſſed it to rhyme the word with thought, ſought, &c. they have as readily admitted it to rhyme with, malt, ſalt, and aſſault.

☞ Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnſton, and, if we may judge by the poſition of the accent, Entick, make only two ſyllables of this word; Mr. Perry, Mr. Nares, and, by the poſition of the accent, Dr. Aſh, three. I do not heſitate a moment to pronounce the laſt diviſion the beſt; not only as it is immediately derived from a French word of three ſyllables feaulté, but as this is generally its quantity in Milton and Shakeſpeare.

" I am in parliament pledge for his truth,
" And laſting fealty to the new-made king."
SHAKESPEARE.

" ——————Let my ſovereign
" Command my eldeſt ſon, nay, all my ſons,
" As pledges of my fealty and love."
IBID.

" ——————Man diſobeying,
" Diſloyal, breaks his fealty, and ſins
" Againſt the high ſupremacy of heav'n."
MILTON.

" ——————Each bird and beaſt behold
" After their kinds; I bring them to receive " From thee their names; and pay thee fealty
" With low ſubjection."
IBID.

" Whether his firſt deſign be to withdraw
" Our fealty to God, or to diſturb
" Conjugal love."
IBID.

In theſe quotations from Johnſon we ſee the firſt only makes fealty two ſyllables; and even here it may be preſumed there is a poetical licence exactly like that which Young uſes in the word really:

" Why really ſixty-five is ſomewhat old."

One who makes or forms; one who counterfeits any thing.

☞ This word is ſometimes, but without the leaſt foundation in analogy, written forgerer. If it ſhould be urged that the word comes from the French verb forger, and therefore, like fruiterer from fruitier, we add an er to make it a verbal noun; it may be anſwered, that we have the word to forge in the ſame ſenſes as the French, but we have no verb to fruit, and therefore there is an excuſe for adding er in the laſt word which has no place in the former.

☞ When this word ſignifies a long ſeat, or a claſs of ſtudents, it is univerſally pronounced with the o, as in four, more, &c. It is not a little ſurpriſing that none of our Dictionaries, except Mr. Smith's and Mr. Nares's, take any notice of this diſtinction in the ſound of the o when the word ſignifies a ſeat or claſs. It were to be wiſhed indeed that we had fewer of theſe ambiguouſly ſounding words, which, while they diſtinguiſh to the ear, confuſe and puzzle the eye. See Bowl.

☞ Some ſpeakers, and thoſe not vulgar ones, pronounce the e in the firſt ſyllable of this and the following words, when the accent is on it, ſhort; as if written frek-wenſe, frekwently, &c. They have undoubtedly the ſhort e in the Latin Frequens to plead; and the Latin quantity is often found to operate in angliciſed words of two ſyllables, with the accent on the firſt: but uſage, in theſe words, ſeems decidedly againſt this pronunciation. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Elphinſton, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Mr. Smith, W. Johnſton, and, if we may judge by the poſition of the accent, Dr. Aſh and Entick are for the e long in the firſt ſyllable; and Buchanan only marks it with the ſhort e. The verb to frequent having the accent on the ſecond ſyllable, is under a different predicament. See DRAMA.

☞ Dr. Johnſon has proved beyond diſpute that farther and fartheſt are not the comparative and ſuperlative of far, but corruptions of the comparative and ſuperlative of forth. However true this diſcovery may be, it does not ſeem a ſufficient reaſon for altering the beaten path which cuſtom had formed in the uſage of farther and fartheſt. It is probable, indeed, that far, fore, and forth, ariſe from the ſame original root: extending beyond ſome other object ſeems to be the leading idea in all. Far ſeems to intimate extenſion beyond an indefinite object; fore only ſuch extenſion as gives priority to the extended object; and forth, from its form, ſeems to relate to the abſtract of ſuch priority of extenſion, or the very act of extending or iſſuing out. If, therefore, forth and far have different ideas annexed to them, the ſame comparative and ſuperlative cannot poſſibly ſuit with both; and as almoſt immemorial uſage has borrowed the comparative and ſuperlative of forth to form the comparative and ſuperlative of far, their ſenſe is now fixed to the latter adverb; and forth, inaſmuch as it differs from far, ſeems entirely to have loſt its compariſon. Notwithſtanding, therefore, that farther and fartheſt are very irregular branches of far, they are grafted on it by uſe, and cannot be altered without diverting the plain tendency of the language. Such, however, has been the force of Dr. Johnſon's criticiſm, that, ſince his time, every writer and printer, unleſs by miſtake, has uſed further and furtheſt for farther and fartheſt; by which means we have revived the comparative and ſuperlative of an adverb which has loſt its compariſon, and have loſt the comparative and ſuperlative of an adverb, which has been compared for theſe two hundred years. But though further paſſes very well for farther, when far is out of ſight, we feel the utmoſt repugnance at ſaying, "Thus far "ſhalt thou go, and no further."

"Some dream that they can ſilence when they

The ſhort e, which is the true ſound of i in theſe words, it has been frequently obſerved, is not really the ſhort ſound of that letter, but of a ſlender, (66); and as r followed by another conſonant has a tendency to lengthen the e as it does the a (77) (81), we find the ſame effect produced, that of interpoſing the ſound of e, nearly as if written egg-yurd, &c. The great majority of ſuffrages for the accent on the firſt ſyllable, which is the moſt agreeable to the analogy of our own language, are certainly ſufficient to keep a plain Engliſhman in countenance for pronouncing the word in this manner; but as it is a French word and a military term, a military man would bluſh not to pronounce it a la Françoiſe; and notwithſtanding the numbers for the other manner, I cannot but think this the moſt faſhionable.

☞ It is much to be regretted that the ſecond ſound of this word is grown much more frequent than the firſt. It is not eaſy to gueſs at the cauſe of this unmeaning deviation from the general rule, but the effect is to impoveriſh the ſound of the language, and to add to its irregularities. It has not, however, like ſome other words, irrecoverably loſt its true pronunciation. Rhyme ſtill claims its right to the long open o, as in bold, cold, fold, &c.

" Judges and Senates have been bought for " gold;
" Eſteem and Love were never to be ſold.
" Now Europe's laurels on their brows be" hold,
" But ſtained with blood, or ill exchang'd for
" gold." POPE.

And ſolemn ſpeaking, particularly the language of Scripture, indiſpenſably requires the ſame ſound. With theſe eſtabliſhed authorities in its favour, it is a diſgrace to the language to ſuffer indolence and vulgarity to corrupt it into the ſecond ſound. See WIND.

GUERDON, gĕr'dŭn. ſ. (166).
A reward, a recompence.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the firſt ſyllable of this word, which he ſpells gwer. I have made the u mute, as in gueſs, not only as agreeable to the French guerdon, but to our own analogy. The authority of Mr. Nares confirms me in my opinion.

☞ It is obſerved in Principles, No. 92, that when g comes before ſhort a the ſound of e ſo neceſſarily intervenes that we cannot write theſe letters without it; but that when the a is long, as in regard, we may pronounce theſe two letters without the intervention of e, but that this pronunciation is not the moſt elegant. The ſame may be obſerved of the g hard, and the long and ſhort i. We may pronounce guide and guile nearly as if written egg-ide and egg-ile, though not ſo properly as egg-yide and egg-yile, but that gild and guilt muſt neceſſarily admit of the e ſound between hard g and i, or we cannot pronounce them.

☞ In this word and its relatives we not unfrequently hear the g hard, as in Gimlet, for this learned reaſon, becauſe they are derived from the Greek. For the very ſame reaſon we ought to pronounce the g in Geneſis, Geography, Geometry, and a thouſand other words, hard, which would eſſentially alter the ſound of our language. Mr. Sheridan has very properly given the ſoft g to theſe words; and Mr. Nares is of the ſame opinion with reſpect to the propriety of this pronunciation, but doubts of the uſage: there can be no doubt, however, of the abſurdity of this uſage, and of the neceſſity of curbing it as much as poſſible. See Principles, No. 350.

Mr. Nares makes the ſound doubtful: but this majority of authorities and agreeableneſs to analogy have removed my doubts, and made me alter my former opinion.

This ariſes from not attending to the diſtinction made by ſyllabication between the ſingle and double l: the double l in the ſame ſyllable deepens the a to broadeſt ſound, as in tall; but when one of the liquids is carried off to the next ſyllable, the a has its ſhort and ſlenderer ſound, as tal-low: the ſame may be obſerved of ball and hallow, &c. HAMMERCLOTH, hăm'mŭr-clŏth. ſ.
The cloth upon the ſeat of the coach-box.

☞ A critic in the Gentleman's Magazine gives the following etymology of this word, which we do not find in any of our Dictionaries:

"When coaches and chariots were firſt introduced, our frugal anceſtors uſed to load the carriage with proviſions for the family when they came to London. The hamper, covered with a cloth, was a convenient repoſitory, and a ſeat for the coachman. This was afterwards converted into a box. Hammer-cloth is therefore very probably a corruption of hamper-cloth."

If the derivation of this word were worth ſpending a thought upon, I ſhould think, that as the ſeat of the coachman is not boarded but ſlung like a hammock, the word is rather a corruption of hammock-cloth.

☞ This word, though for ages obſolete, or heard only in the proper names of Fetherſtonehaugh, Philiphaugh, &c. ſeems to have riſen from the dead in the late whimſical deception we meet with in ſome gardens where we are ſuddenly ſtopped by a deep valley wholly imperceptible till we come to the edge of it. The expreſſion of ſurprize, hah! hah! which generally breaks out upon a diſcovery of the deception, is commonly ſuppoſed to be the origin of this word: but the old word Haugh is ſo nearly related to the ſignification of the new term haw, haw, that it ſeems much the more natural parent of it.

☞ This word was in quiet poſſeſſion of its true ſound till a late dramatic piece made its appearance, which, to the ſurpriſe of thoſe who had heard the language ſpoken half a century, was, by ſome ſpeakers, called the Haunted Tower. This was certainly the improvement of ſome critick in the language; for a plain common ſpeaker would undoubtedly have pronounced the au, as in aunt, jaunt, &c. and as it had always been pronounced in the Drummer, or the Haunted Houſe. That this pronunciation is agreeable to analogy, ſee Principles, No. 214.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Aſh, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, and Bailey, unite in placing the accent on the firſt ſyllable of this word; Entick alone places it on the third. Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan place an accent alſo on the laſt ſyllable, and make the i long; while Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Perry make it ſhort. That the accent ought to be on the firſt ſyllable cannot be doubted, when we conſider how uniformly we remove the accent higher when we angliciſe Latin words by ſhortening them: and though the i in theſe terminations is rather ambiguous (156), it certainly inclines to the long ſound which Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan have given it. See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

☞ There is an affected pronunciation of this and the two preceding words, which, contrary to our own analogy, preſerves the g hard. The plea is, that theſe words are derived from the Greek, which always preſerved the gamma hard. To produce this reaſon, is to expoſe it. What would become of our language if every word from the Greek and Latin, that had g in it, were ſo pronounced? What is moſt to be regretted is, that men of learning ſometimes join in theſe pedantic deviations, which are only worthy of the loweſt order of critical coxcombs. See GYMNASTICK.

HICCOUGH, hĭk'kŭp, or hĭk'kŏf. ſ.
A convulſion of the ſtomach producing ſobs.

☞ This is one of thoſe words which ſeems to have been corrupted by a laudable intention of bringing it nearer to its original. The convulſive ſob was ſuppoſed to be a ſpecies of cough; but neither Junius nor Skinner mention any ſuch derivation, and both ſuppoſe it formed from the ſound it occaſions. Accordingly we find, though hiccough is the moſt general orthography, hickup is the moſt uſual pronunciation. Thus Butler:

"Quoth he, to bid me not to love,
"Is to forbid my pulſe to move;
"My beard to grow, my ears to prick up,
"Or, when I'm in a fit, to hickup."

Junius derives this word from the Belgic Ockſhood, oghſhood, or bockſhoot. Minſhew, ſays Skinner, derives it from Ockſhood and Ogſhood; but he himſelf is of opinion that it rather comes from the Latin Orca; a great ſea-fiſh, an enemy to the whale, and the Belgic hoofd, as much as to ſay, Ork's hoofd; that is, Orcæ caput, an Ork's head.
